The Commission will also pay Panama a third annuity of up to $10 million only to the extent the Commission has a surplus. Should the Canal's revenues not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this contingent payment, the unpaid balance would be paid from future year surpluses.

Any unpaid balance remaining at the expiration of the Treaty would not represent a liability to the United States. Since this payment is only a contingent obligation, the Panama Canal Commission is not required to reflect it in its budget or the toll base.

In addition, Article III of the Treaty which is discussed in greater detail below requires an annual payment of $10 million for specified public services furnished by Panama in Commission operating and housing areas. This reimbursement is for public services which currently cost the U.S. Government approximately $18 million to perform.

Governor Parfitt, speaking for the Panama Canal Company, has suggested that an initial toll increase of 19.6 percent over existing rates would be required to meet these costs. However, the Governor pointed out a similar toll increase would be necessary by 1981 even without the treaties. American Management Services Commission has suggested an initial toll increase of 25 percent. The State Department in its initial estimates and testimony had suggested a toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 to 40 percent which subsequent study indicates was excessively conservative.

A study on Canal traffic and revenue forecasts recently completed by International Research Associates offers estimates that are more optimistic than those developed by our negotiating staff during the actual treaty negotiations. The study concludes that:

(a) Tolls could be increased up to slightly over 100 percent before revenues would begin to decline.

(b) Toll rate increases ranging from 15 percent to 50 percent would result in losses of traffic, on a tonnage basis, ranging from 2.4 percent for a 15 percent increase to 11.8 percent for a 50 percent increase.

Various studies concur in the finding that an initial toll increase is well within the ability of the Canal to generate revenue through tolls.

This was our judgment during the negotiations. It is a judgment which has been supported by all subsequent analyses with which we are familiar, including the IRA study, a study of Commission costs by Arthur Anderson, and the findings of the Armed Services Committee consultant whose report was issued by the Armed Services Committee on February 1.

WHAT COST SAVINGS WILL BE AFFECTED?

Since 1951, the Panama Canal Company has been administered as a self-sustaining U.S. Government corporation. Currently, in addition to the Canal, annual costs funded by Canal revenues include the Canal Zone Government, Canal Company retail and commercial operations, an "interest" payment to the Treasury of $18 to $20 million and approximately $500,000 of the $2.3 million annuity paid to Panama under the 1903 treaty.

In addition to the requirement to provide payments to Panama, the cost structure of the Panama Canal operation will be changed significantly by the new treaty.

The costs of the Canal Zone Government (about $25 million per year) will disappear after a 30 month transition period. In addition, all commercial and retail facilities will no longer be part of the Canal operation. Costs of providing schools and hospitals for Canal Zone employees will be reimbursed from toll revenues, as is now the case.

The new treaty provides that the Commission pay Panama $10 million per year in return for public services provided by Panama in the Canal operating and housing areas. This cost will be in contrast to the costs currently paid of approximately $18 million.

The Executive Branch will specifically recommend to Congress that the legislation organizing the Panama Canal Commission not charge it with an annual "interest" payment to the Treasury of $18 to $20 million. Congress, however, can decide to include an interest payment in the cost base to be covered by increased tolls. The Congress should recognize that it has always been the policy of the United States to operate the Canal as a public service and that this interest charge is in some ways a departure from this concept.

Beyond these cost savings, American Management Services has reviewed planning budgets for the Panama Canal operation and has considered reductions proposed in connection with the reduced scope of activity of the Panama Canal Commission versus the Panama Canal Company. The American Management Study reported that cost reductions, even larger than those envisioned by the Company, could be made.

WHAT WILL BE THE IMPACT OF THE TREATIES ON DOMESTIC AND WORLD COMMERCE?

Since 1914, the Panama Canal has served world commerce as an important transportation route. Canal traffic has risen from 5 million Panama tons in 1915 to 123 million Panama Canal tons in fiscal year 1977. The IRA study indicates that traffic will further increase to 201.9 million tons by the year 2000.

Canal toll rates, however, have remained at low levels. They have changed very little over the years despite mammoth price changes for just about everything else. In 1914, tolls were set at $1.20 per laden Panama Canal ton, and changed to 90 cents per laden ton in 1937. Since 1974, there have been increases in toll rates of 50 percent. Tolls today are set at $1.29 per laden ton.

A toll increase of 20 to 30 percent over existing levels will have a minimum, if not negligible, impact on our trade and economy. A toll increase of about 30 percent will involve a transportation cost increase of less than one percent. Users of the Canal would pay only about $50 million more in tolls per year on cargoes that have a value in excess of roughly $50 billion, or one-tenth of one percent. In most instances, it will be the foreign buyer of U.S. commodities transiting the Canal who is the ultimate payer of Canal tolls and not the seller or shipper. Therefore, of the $50 million, U.S. businesses and consumers will be the ultimate payers of only about $15 million. The overall impact of this on a $1.7 trillion economy is negligible on either our business or the purchasing power of the consumer.

Obviously, there are uncertainties with respect to Panama Canal traffic and revenue, especially after 1990. The same is true of any projection of world or national economic conditions. These uncertainties would exist whether or not we undertake a new treaty relationship with Panama. The new treaty will provide a stable environment, while the alternative of continuing the present relationship could almost certainly involve greater costs and uncertainty for shippers.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, during the past several years the question of the Panama Canal Treaty has assumed greater and greater importance. In recent months it has become an emotional issue to the extent that my constituent mail is now almost totally against ratification. I have consistently told my correspondents that I prefer to wait until we held hearings in the Senate Armed Services Committee before making up my mind. I thought it was in our national interest to review the subject objectively so that whatever we do would be in the best interest of the United States. So you might say I am uncommitted and therefore this subject has considerable significance to me. In reviewing the material on the proposed treaties I am struck by the lopsided concessions being proposed in an attempt to obtain an agreement. I am not opposed to a new treaty if sufficient safeguards are included, but do feel some amendments are in order and am glad to see that the majority and minority leaders feel the same way.

Panama is seeking to take on vast responsibilities, in fact to take the place of the United States in running the Panama Canal which has great importance to the United States and the entire world. Accordingly, it appears proper to look at her capability to do so. The basic economy of Panama without the canal appears badly shaken. The Torrijos government seized power in 1968 when the Panamanian economy was riding the crest of a wave that began in the early 1960's. The rate of growth was an astounding 8 percent. Then in 1974 a recession started. By 1975 things started picking up elsewhere in Latin America but not in Panama. By 1977 Panama's economic growth rate had sunk from 8 percent to less than 1 percent. The national debt had risen from $167 million in 1968 to $1.5 billion in 1977. Almost a 1,000-percent increase in 8 years. The per capita debt had become the largest in all of Latin America. The annual interest payment on the national debt alone has reached $150 million, almost half of the current revenue taken in by the government. The balance of payments stands at a staggering minus $500 million, about half of their gross national product.

Financed for the past several years by loans from abroad, most of them short term, Panama has just about run out of credit. Three-fourths of the current debt will come due within the next 10 years. If it were not for the stability provided from the income of the canal, Panama would be broke. With that background I would like to highlight what we found out in recent hearings in the Senate Armed Services Committee.

We consistently hear the statement that the new treaty will cost the taxpayers nothing. That all expenses will be paid out of revenue generated by canal tolls. Well, that doesn't tell the whole story. It was my privilege to chair the Senate Armed Services Committee hearings when we looked into the financial aspects of the treaties.

The first 2 days of our hearings were principally concerned with the military implications of the proposed changes in our relationship with Panama. During the last 2 days we moved into the financial and economic aspects.

While a great deal of attention in the Senate and in public discussion has been given the neutrality treaty and to the other broad issues raised by the treaties, not enough attention has been focused on the financial arrangements. Major changes are to be made in the structure and operations of the canal enterprise, including adding large payments to Panama onto the costs of operating the waterway. We need to satisfy ourselves that these provisions are sound and that they will not lead to trouble later if the treaties are ratified.

Before delving into the question, however, I would like to bring the subject into focus. A major reason for building the canal was to promote ocean commerce for the United States. A major importance of the canal to the United States and I might add to the entire world. If it is going to continue to be important from an economic standpoint, much is at stake in the proposed new treaties, particularly in relation to the canal's future operational control.

The true economic significance of the canal has always been in the distance and time savings it affords interocean shipping. The canal cuts 7800 miles off the distance between New York and San Francisco. The days saved are also impressive. For example, a ship traveling at 15 knots can reach Los Angeles from New York in 13 days by way of the Canal. It takes more than a month around South America, through the Straits of Magellan. Savings in miles and days mean fewer ships are required for the movement of the same amount of cargo. Hence it also means reduced fuel consumption and lowered crewing costs, which is a big economic factor. So the big question is, what does the Canal mean to the United States from an economic viewpoint?

About 66 percent of all cargo that moves through the canal comes or goes to U.S. ports. Of that amount, about 34 percent is exports from the United States, 23 percent is imports into the United States, and about 9 percent is U.S. coastal trade. This will increase with the shipment of Alaskan oil to our east coast.

The canal is of great importance to South America and also we cannot overlook its importance to the Far East. A lot of westbound cargo going through the canal is headed for Japan, Australia, and New Zealand. Generally speaking the number of ships transiting the canal has increased steadily over the years reaching a peak of 14,000 in 1971. This dropped off for the next 2 years but went back up over 14,000 in 1974. Since then there has been a decline. During the period 1973 to 1976 the number of ships transiting the canal each day dropped from 39 to 33. In the meantime, operating costs increased. In 1973 the Canal Company sustained a loss for the first time in the canal's history. It has lost money every year since except for last year despite a hike in toll rates in 1974 and another in 1976. I would like to examine why this is so. Probably for the foreseeable future, foreign trade in bulk commodities like coal, oil, ore, and agricultural products will continue to be transported by ship. But there is a change going on in the technology of transportation. One need only look at the constantly increasing volume of air transportation to appreciate what is happening. We have already seen the end of express passenger ships. They have been replaced by the airplane. With the use of jumbo jets, air freight is growing at a rapid rate.

Also a development that could in time have an effect on canal traffic is the minibridge system being advanced by the U.S. railroads. This involves the movement of goods in containers across the United States on fast unitized trains operating on schedules synchronized with ship arrivals and departures at east and west coast ports. If the nation's railroads become viable again which is an AMTRAC goal, the effect of the mini-bridge concept on the canal's economic value to United States foreign trade could be substantial.

Then too, we have the era of oversized ships unable to transit the canal, like the huge oil tankers. Already there are over 1,000 vessels in the world's mercantile fleet that cannot go through the canal because of their size. In addition to oil, some carry large quantities of dry bulk commodities such as ore, coal, and grain. In total, these oversized vessels are bound to have an economic impact on the canal. Also the reopening of the Suez Canal several years back has had some effect.

So we have a problem of rising costs and no assurance of steady canal traffic. I have some concern that this issue is not being faced squarely in our treaty considerations. It does appear that unless the canal is subsidized, tolls will have to be increased further to make ends meet. We have had two increases totaling over 40 percent, one in 1974, and the other in 1976; so the question is really how much in the way of increases will the traffic bear? What is the likelihood that the Panama Canal Commission, when viewed as a business enterprise, will be self-sustaining and under what conditions can this be achieved? These are some of the issues the Armed Services Committee looked at.

Because of the committee's special concern over the financial impact of these treaties, it engaged its own outside financial consultant to make an independent appraisal. Though the time to accomplish an undertaking of this scope was extremely short, the consultant did an excellent job, and produced an interesting and provocative report.

The committee had four principal areas of interest.

First, we felt it was necessary to explore the details of the treaties' financial workings because the administration has stressed from the beginning that the treaties involve no cost to the taxpayer and no appropriated funds. It is vitally important that the Senate understand before it votes on these treaties whether that is true or not. What are the direct costs of implementing these treaties, and what are the risks that appropriated funds will be necessary to support the Panama Canal Commission during the next 22 years? What burdens will the taxpayers actually assume? In order to answer these questions we need to understand how the treaties work and what the prospects for profitable operation of the canal really are.

Second, we need to analyze more closely than has been the case thus far the provisions of the treaties relating to payments to Panama. There are ambiguities in those provisions which need to be cleared up so that the Senate can determine whether modifications of the financial provisions are necessary.

Third, is the closely related question whether these financial arrangements have the potential for increasing rather than decreasing the friction between the United States and Panama in the years to come. If the financial provisions have serious ambiguities, or if they create an operational structure that will lead to disputes about how much money the Panamanians are supposed to receive, we need to know about it. One of the major arguments in favor of the treaties has been that they will create a friendly and cooperative attitude which is crucial to canal defense and efficient operation. If that friendly and cooperative attitude will be undermined by continuing financial problems and deficits, we will have gained little or nothing in this effort to reformulate United States-Panamanian relations.

Finally, the financial problems have a direct bearing on our ability to keep the canal open and keep it operating efficiently. If we have constructed through these treaties a financial structure that is doomed to failure then we must act now, before the treaties are approved, to prevent that structure from affecting our vital interest in free and open access to the canal.

The committee had expert witnesses to assist them in reviewing these matters. They were Maj. Gen. Harold Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone and President of the Panama Canal Company; Mr. Frank Nicolai of American Management Systems, who supervised the work AMS did on these problems for the Armed Services Committee; and the Honorable Elmer B. Staats, the Comptroller General of the United States.

Before reviewing what these witnesses told us I would like to itemize what we have agreed to provide to Panama in a financial way.

Panama will receive 30 cents per ton transiting the canal. Also a fixed sum of $10 million per annum and an additional $10 million per year if canal traffic revenue permits. In addition the United States pledges to arrange for an economic program of loans under existing statutory programs. Up to $200 million in Export-Import Bank credits; up to $75 million in AID housing guarantees; and $200 million in Overseas Private Investment Corporation loan guarantees. This totals some $300 million. Also, Panama will receive up to $50 million in foreign military sales credits over a period of 10 years to assist in the canal's defense. The current annual payments by the United States to Panama is $2.3 million.

Now to discuss specifics.

General Parfitt, Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, warned that the canal operation may not be self-sustaining after 1984 under the terms of the treaties being considered. He said in answer to questions from committee members that the United States would be obliged to turn over the canal to Panama in the year 2000 free of lien and debts.

If there are outstanding debts the U.S. Government will have to pay them when the canal passes into Panama's hands. The Governor said that after 1984 canal revenue probably will not support the operation of the canal or meet the U.S. obligation to pay Panama large sums of money from toll revenues.

In his estimation, this means there is a high probability that the United States will have to make up the differences between 1984 and 2000 from appropriated funds. And since the treaties require that the canal pass to Panama debt free, his testimony means that the United States would have to write off the millions of dollars owed to it by the Panama Canal Commission.

There is another item that is not clearly understood which relates to the public service fund of $10 million a year. This amount is given to Panama for police and other services and is calculated at what it would cost the United States at American wage scales. The cost to Panama is less than half that amount a year because of their lower wages. Consequently there appears to be a $5 million annual Panamanian profit on the public service fund payment at U.S. expense.

In reference to canal tolls, the long period of toll rate stability in the words of Governor Parfitt has lulled many into the illusion that there was some special magic at work on the isthmus that sheltered the Panama Canal from economic pressures. To the contrary, toll rates and stability are dependent, as are prices in most businesses, on the volume of business and the rate of inflation. He said periodic increases in tolls will be required even without taking into account the impact of the new treaties. He estimated these increases would begin early in the 1980's and be necessary about every 3 years with average increases of about 10 or 11 percent.

He also warned that canal traffic is sensitive to toll increases and that there is a point of diminishing return on how high tolls can be raised to increase revenues. Increases of 50 percent would result in little additional revenue and that the maximum amount of additional revenue obtainable is about 40 percent which would require toll increases of between 75 to 100 percent to obtain.

The implication is that toll increases beyond a certain point would force traffic to use other routes like going around the cape. He foresaw no problem between 1978 through 1984 because North Slope oil from Alaska would generate enough tolls to cover all operations. But after that when oil pipelines will be traversing the United States, it appears periodic toll increases will be required.

Comptroller General Elmer B. Staats warned the committee of another potential problem in the treaties pertaining to the payment of $10 million a year to Panama. Some Panamanians contend that the $10 million carries over into the next year if canal receipts are insufficient to pay it the first year. This means the United States might owe Panama $220 million at the end of the treaties if the canal does not break even or make a profit during the life of the treaties. The Department of State feels that the Canal Commission will be obligated to make the payment only to the extent that operating surpluses exist and that there will be no obligation to pay Panama any unpaid cumulative balance after December 31, 1999. There are of course other monetary implications which when considered in their totality could cost the American taxpayers well over $2 billion.

Mr. Staats and Governor Parfitt both recommend that State's interpretation be spelled out in implementing legislation. In that regard it would help considerably if the administration presented the Senate with the information to accommodate the Senate's understanding of how the treaties are to be implemented. To date the Senate has not even been privileged to see an outline.

However, the Senate Armed Services Committee has written a report on its hearings as has the Foreign Relations Committee. The report by the Armed Services Committee is a summary of the testimony I have just commented on. It is indexed by subject matter for easy reference and makes no conclusions or recommendations, leaving that up to the judgment of each individual Senator. I commend it to my colleagues as necessary reading before making up their minds on the financial aspects of these treaties.

PANAMA CANAL

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. President, after carefully examining the strong and persuasive arguments on both sides, after listening to the testimony of some of the expert witnesses before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and visiting Panama. I have concluded that on balance ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties is in the best interests of the United States.

These treaties have been negotiated to replace the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty—a source of irritation in the relations between the United States and Panama since the day it was signed. It is important to mention that the 1903 treaty was negotiated and signed for Panama by a French citizen, Philippe Bunau-Varilla. No Panamanian ever saw the treaty before it was signed. Panama had no choice but to ratify the treaty, for failure to do so would have meant a return of the Colombian armed forces. The 1903 treaty created a canal zone which is still seen by most Panamanians as infringing upon their sovereignty. They feel that it would be analogous to another country controlling a stretch of land 10 miles long, running the full length of the Mississippi River. Panamanians have also been concerned that the 1903 treaty deprives them of the full benefit of their major natural resource—their geographic location.

Because the historical background is essential to an understanding of the issue, I am attaching a statement I issued on February 3, 1977.

Mr. President, while I feel sympathy for the sentiments of the Panamanian people, my greatest concern is the long-term security and foreign policy interests of the United States. In 1964, President Johnson announced the intention of the United States to negotiate a new treaty with Panama. Since then, each President, two Democratic and two Republican, has worked toward achieving this goal.

Presidents Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter were persuaded that a new treaty relationship with Panama is more likely to serve long-term security and foreign policy interests of the United States. Above all, it would assure what is the essence of our interests—the efficiency, neutrality, accessibility, and security of the Panama Canal.

Americans are faced with a difficult choice. We do not know how well the new treaties will operate. We do not know if they take into account all contingencies. We are forced to make a choice between the uncertainty of the future against the unacceptability of the past.

The new treaties present us with risks, but Americans have always been willing to accept risks, provided they seem reasonable. I believe that these new treaties are as reasonable for our time as those risks that were assumed by Teddy Roosevelt in his time.

Another important consideration is how the new treaties would affect our relations with other Latin American countries. The other nations of Latin America have joined with Panama in urging a new treaty with the United States. In their eyes, the canal runs not just through the center of Panama but through the center of the Western Hemisphere. Indeed, the problem affects our relations with the entire Third World, since the nations of the Third World have made common cause on this issue. In March 1973, the United Nations Security Council would have passed a resolution favoring the Panamanian position on this issue had not the United States used its veto. The other nations of the world view our position on the canal as the last vestige of a colonial past which evokes bitter memories and deep animosities. The new canal treaties provide the United States with a unique position to improve our relations with virtually all of the countries of this hemisphere, and, indeed, the people of the entire developing world.

Mr. President, before arriving at my decision to support these treaties, I listened very carefully to the opponents and to the arguments that they made. I read with great interest the vast volume of mail from my constituents in Kansas. I must admit that I, too, have been deeply troubled by many of the issues raised by opponents of the treaties. Primarily these deal with the sovereignty issue, the economic questions, the possible need for a new sea level canal, the security questions and the role of Omar Torrijos.

Mr. President, many of my constituents have written to me and asked, "We bought it, we paid for it, why give it away?" "If we give away Panama, what is to prevent us from giving away Alaska or Louisiana?"

To answer those questions, one must look at article 3 of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty in which the U.S. was granted all "rights, power, and authority within the zone," as "if it were sovereign." The United States never claimed sovereignty over the Canal Zone. In fact, we continue to pay rent for the use of the Zone.

Secretary of War William Howard Taft, the future President and later Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, studied the question of sovereignty further and declared,

The truth is that while we have all the attributes of sovereignty in the construction, maintenance, and protection of the canal, the very form in which these attributes are conferred in the treaty seems to preserve the titular sovereignty over the canal zone in the Republic of Panama.

The United States did not purchase the Canal Zone as it did Alaska and Louisiana. The Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty provided for a payment of $10 million to Panama for treaty rights, not territory. In the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, France ceded to the United States, "forever and in full sovereignty the territory with all its rights and appurtenances." When the United States purchased Alaska, it received all rights, franchises and privileges previously belonging to Russia. In both cases, the United States received all public lands and all the inhabitants became U.S. citizens. In neither case did the United States have to pay a continuing annuity or rent or assume other obligations after taking over the territory. In addition, it should be mentioned that children born in Alaska or Louisiana are automatically U.S. citizens, while children born in the Canal Zone do not automatically become American citizens.

Mr. President, let me turn to some of the economic considerations involved. The Panama Canal Treaty changes the basic economic assumptions under which the canal has historically been operated. For the first time in history the new treaty gives long overdue recognition to the fact that the canal is Panama's primary economic resource. While Panama has benefited from the presence of the canal through salaries paid Panamanian nationals, direct purchases by the Canal Company and establishment of private, commercial, and service industries related to the canal, the direct payment to Panama for use of the canal was held to a minimum, presently only $2.3 million annually.

The important point to consider is that the treaty does not allocate one dime from the American Treasury to go to Panama. The entire payments to Panama specified in the treaty are all to come from canal revenues. The United States has been operating the canal "at cost." We have deliberately kept the canal's toll rates low. In effect, the United States has been subsidizing the shippers of the over 70 nations which use the canal. The canal could easily absorb the toll increases that might be needed under the new treaty. These increases would provide sufficient revenue to pay Panama the annuities pledged in article XIII.

Toll increases would have less than a 2-percent effect on the total shipping costs of items that transit the canal. The total effect on the cost to the American consumer would be even smaller. Thus, I agree with the Foreign Relations Committee which concluded that the economic effect of the new treaty on the total U.S. economy would be minimal.

Mr. President, I have received a number of letters questioning the additional economic package to Panama. This additional assistance program is not part of the Panama Canal treaties. It will be considered by separate congressional procedures. The program is based upon the desire for greater cooperation between the United States and Panama, in light of the new partnership arrangements which will result from the treaty. It must also be pointed out that this assistance program consists of loans, not grants. The bulk of the program is supported by money lent by the Export-Import Bank for American exports to Panama. In addition, this section will help U.S. manufacturers, and it will not cost the American taxpayer any money.

Mr. President, I am concerned about the future capacity of the Panama Canal and the possible necessity to enlarge it or to build a new canal. The canal is truly the "moonshot of the early 20th century." As David McCollough wrote in his excellent book, "The Path Between the Seas,"

The creation of a water passage across Panama was one of the supreme human achievements of all time, the culmination of a heroic dream of 400 years and of more than 20 years of phenomenal effort and sacrifice * * * Primarily the canal is an expression of that old and noble desire to bridge the divide, to bring people together. It is a work of civilization.

The canal is a masterpiece of design and construction. The locks have performed well from the time they were opened. Ships now transit the canal at a rate of over one per hour, every hour of the day during the year.

Ships of a size that were never dreamed of when the canal was built are now capable of transiting the canal. However, we are now building larger and larger ships, and it may become necessary to build a new canal in the future.

Section 2 of article XII of the Canal Treaty prevents the United States from building a new sea level canal in any other place other than Panama. On the other hand, it prevents Panama from negotiating with any other power to build a canal through its territory.

Mr. President, this section has received much criticism, but it was added at the insistence of the United States. President Johnson appointed the Atlantic-Pacific InterOceanic Canal Study Commission, headed by former Secretary of the Navy, Robert Anderson. In 1970, the Commission filed its voluminous report, concluding that the best route for a sea level canal would be in Panama. We did not wish Panama to negotiate with other powers to build such a canal. Thus, our negotiators insisted that the treaty include the provision giving us the first option on a sea level canal in Panama. Now, if the treaty is approved, Panama cannot allow another country to build such a waterway unless the United States grants permission. In return for this concession, we agreed not to build a canal in any other country other than Panama, which we had no intention of doing in any case.

Mr. President, I also am concerned about the defense of the canal. The defense of the Panama Canal consists of two components: internal security and external defense. Both are presently the responsibility of the U.S. Government. Internal security is primarily concerned with countering sabotage and terrorist activities. Under the new treaty the internal defense of the Panama Canal will be greatly enhanced by our cooperating with the Government of Panama.

The external defense of the canal will remain the primary responsibility of the United States during the balance of this century. Under the new Panama Canal Treaty, the Panamanian Guardia Nacional and appropriate U.S. commanders will develop plans in concert to provide for mutual defense. As past and present members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have repeatedly pointed out, the capacity to defend the Panama Canal would be improved through cooperation with the Government of Panama. After the year 2000, the Neutrality Treaty provides for a canal open to ships of all nations in times of peace or war. However, it specifically provides that the United States and Panamanian Naval ships shall transit expeditiously and without impediments or preconditions.

Our ability to defend the canal, and our rights to do so, were further strengthened by the "Statement of Understanding" by President Carter and Omar Torrijos, which are now amendments to the treaty.

Although we can never be sure that no one will ever attack the canal, we can be sure that the United States will always be prepared to defend it.

Mr. President, I must admit that the aspect of these treaties which troubles me most is that we had to deal with the government of Omar Torrijos. I am troubled that Torrijos is a dictator. I am troubled that Panama's "human rights policies" leave a lot to be desired.

The treaties do not accomplish the impossible. They will not restructure the Government of Panama in our own image; they will not guarantee respect for human rights; they will not prevent drug smuggling through Panama into the United States; they will not insure that every Panamanian Government official will agree with the ideological line of the United States. But, while I wish the United States did not have to deal with Torrijos, we cannot pick and choose the heads of governments of other countries. We deal with the leaders of many countries, even when we disagree with them. We should also not forget that the United States has been committed to a new Panama Canal Treaty since 1964, 4 years before Torrijos came to power.

Although we may not approve of the Torrijos regime, it is important to note that the recent plebiscite in Panama approved the treaties by a majority of over 2 to 1. Whatever the Panamanian people may think of Torrijos, they are strong in their opposition to the continuation of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty. As William Jordan, our Ambassador to Panama, testified before the Foreign Relations Committee,

This is an issue—probably the only issue—which brings Panamanians together in a kind of national unanimity that is rare in history. * * * Talk with Panamanians. You will find that whether they are rich or poor, city or campesinos, university graduates or day laborers, they are as one in their dream of a Panama that is united and sovereign, a country that is no longer divided in half by a foreign enclave.

In sum, Mr. President, I support the new treaties because they are in the best interests of the United States. They will make the canal easier to operate and easier to defend. They will assure for the United States continued access to the canal, for both military and commercial purposes. They will advance our position throughout Latin America, and, in many important respects, throughout the world. It is a signal to the world community that few actions can be taken independent of the welfare of others.

Finally, they will fulfill the expectations of every American that this country will continue to act as a world leader, proud of its heritage and willing to accept the challenges of the future. As Theodore Roosevelt stated,

The important thing is the next step. It often happens that the good conditions of the past can be regained not by going back, but by going forward. We cannot recreate what is dead; we cannot stop the march of events; but we can direct this march, and out of the conditions develop something better than the past knew.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND ON THE PANAMA CANAL

To understand the present situation, it is necessary to review the events that led up to the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 and see how it came about, for it is still at the heart of the argument. Americans had been interested in a Panama Canal as early as 1826, when Secretary of State Henry Clay came out in favor of building such canal. In 1850, the United States and Britain agreed to the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty stating that both nations would cooperate in the construction of an isthmian canal; they also bound themselves never to fortify or exercise exclusive control over such a waterway.

From 1881 through 1889, the French attempted to build a canal through Panama. The French ran into insuperable medical, engineering and financial problems. More than 20,000 workers died, mostly from yellow fever. In one stretch of the Canal, the walls kept caving in as fast as they were dug. Besides the tremendous actual cost of the construction, the company building the canal was rocked by charges of high-level corruption.

The United States emerged from the Spanish-American War a Caribbean as well as a Pacific power. This changed status brought about a remarkable resurgence of interest in an isthmian canal. Although the United States had built a railroad across the isthmus, such a water passage now seemed imperatively necessary if the American people were to take full advantage of their new trade opportunities in the Pacific, and at the same time, unfeather their fleet. During the war, the United States battleship Oregon had been ordered from Puget Sound to Cuban waters. It had to sail almost 13,000 miles around Cape Horn to get from the Pacific to the Atlantic; had there been a canal, the ship would have had to travel only 4,600 miles.

The first obstacle in the path of the building of the canal was diplomatic, rather than physical. In November 1901, two months after the assassination of President McKinley, Britain agreed to give up its claims to the United States. The second Hay-Pauncefote Treaty allowed the United States a free hand to build, control and fortify an isthmian canal.

In 1899, Congress appointed the Walker Commission to study whether it would be better to build the canal in Panama or Nicaragua. In November 1901, the Commission reported in favor of the Nicaraguan route, primarily on the grounds of lower costs. On January 9, 1902, the House of Representatives voted in favor of a Nicaraguan waterway (308 to 2). Shortly thereafter, Congress changed its mind and voted to support the Panamanian route, largely as a result of the efforts of William Cromwell and Philippe Bunau-Varilla. Cromwell was a member of the law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, John Foster Dulles' law firm. The firm represented the railroad that the Americans had built across the isthmus. Bunau-Varilla represented the new Panama Canal Company successor to the French Canal Company.

Bunau-Varilla and Cromwell formed an alliance to convince the United States to opt for a canal through Panama; their price was originally $109 million, but this was quickly reduced to $40 million. Cromwell was most influential, especially as he had donated $60,000 to the Republican National Committee. The Committee Chairman, Senator Mark Hanna, changed his support to a Panama route shortly after this. Bunau-Varilla astutely lobbied for the Panama route by sending each Senator a letter with the postage stamp showing volcanic action in Nicaragua. In June 1902, Congress approved the Panama route.

In 1903, Panama was still part of Colombia. The Hay-Herran Treaty in January 1903, gave the United States the Canal Zone, six miles wide, for a cash payment of $10 million and an annual payment of $250,000 to Colombia. The new Panama Canal Company was to receive $40 million for their rights and property and the trans-isthmus Panama railroad.

In August 1903, Colombia rejected the pact, due to insufficient funds and the possibility that it seriously impinged upon Colombian sovereignty in Panama. Roosevelt referred to the Colombians as "insufficient bandits," "foolish and homicidal corruptionists", "contemptible little creatures", "jack rabbits", and "cat rabbits". He stated that "the blackmailers of Bogota . . . should not be permitted to permanently bar one of the future highways of civilization."

Bunau-Varilla was convicted that the time was right for Panama to revolt against Colombia. The center of the revolutionary activity was Room 1162 of the Hotel Waldorf Astoria in New York City. The revolutionists raised a "patriot" army consisting of 500 bought" Colombian troops, in addition to members of the local fire department. The leader of the revolt was Dr. Manuel Ambador, a physician who had worked for Cromwell's railroad. Dr. Ambador was presented with $100,000, supplied by J. P. Morgan, a secret code, a Declaration of Independence, a draft of the new nation's Constitution, and the soon to be born Republic's flag, thoughtfully designed and sewn by Bunau-Varilla's wife. On November 2, 1903, the U.S.S. Nashville reached Colon, Panama. A day later, the revolt took place and on November 4, Panama declared its independence. An hour after the news reached Washington, the new government was recognized.

Bunau-Varilla, although a French citizen, represented the Republic of Panama in Washington. Hay sent him a draft treaty similar to the Colombian one. Two days later, Bunau-Varilla sent one back more disadvantageous to Panama, in the hope that the Senate would approve it. A day later, and only a few hours before representatives from Panama came to negotiate a treaty, the new pact was signed. Hay admitted we shall have a treaty vastly advantageous to the United States, and we must confess, not so advantageous to Panama."

The Hay-Bunau-Varilla gave the United States the right to the Canal in perpetuity"—instead of to the year 2003, which the Colombian Treaty had called for. Article II afforded the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the Territory."

The Panamanians were disappointed with the terms and talked of rejecting the Treaty. They were warned that Colombia might try and overthrow the new government and that the United States would not help unless Panama agreed to the Treaty. With the news that Colombian gun boats were on their way to Panama, the Panamanian government ratified the Treaty in February 1904.

The European and Latin American press criticized Roosevelt, who defended himself by claiming a "mandate from civilization." In 1911, Roosevelt boasted "I took the Canal Zone and let Congress debate; and while the debate goes on, the Canal does also".

In 1914, a Treaty was signed with Colombia in which the United States "expressed sincere regret" for the Panama business and agreed to pay a $25 million sum as compensation for the loss of Panama. Roosevelt's friends in the Senate, notably Henry Cabot Lodge, were able to defeat this Treaty. In 1921, a new Treaty paying Colombia $25 million was accepted.

BRIEF ANALYSIS OF THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

In 1903, the United States and the Republic of Panama signed the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty which granted the United States a strip of land ten miles wide and fifty miles long for the purpose of constructing, operating, maintaining and defending a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and which gave the United States rights as "if it were the sovereign" in perpetuity on Panamanian soil.

The events leading up to the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty are important in order to gain a full understanding of U.S.-Panamanian relations. As President Theodore Roosevelt himself boasted in 1911, "I am interested in the Panama Canal because I started it. If I had followed the traditional conservative methods, I would have submitted a dignified state paper of probably 200 pages to Congress and the debates on it would still have been going on yet; but I took the Canal Zone and let Congress debate; and while the debate goes on the Canal does also."

The basic Treaty was revised twice. The 1936 Hull-Alfaro Treaty cancelled U.S. guarantees of Panamanian independence from Colombia and the right of the U.S. to intervene in certain internal Panamanian affairs. It also increased the annual U.S. payment to Panama from $250,000 to $430,000. In 1955, the Eisenhower-Remon Treaty transferred certain U.S. rights and properties to Panama and again increased the annual payment, this time to $1.93 million.

From the Panamanian point of view the existence of a United States controlled "enclave" in the heart of their sovereign territory has become a major affront to national dignity and national sovereignty. It is virtually the only issue capable of uniting all Panamanians. Among the major grievances voiced by Panama are the existence of a United States "government within a government" in their territory, the "overwhelming presence" of U.S. civilian and military personnel and the inequitable sharing of the economic benefits derived from the Canal.

In the past, this nationalist sentiment has erupted periodically and it culminated in serious demonstrations in 1959 and again in 1964. Recognizing the vulnerability of the situation, President Johnson committed the U.S. to bilateral negotiations in 1964. By 1967, three draft treaties had been agreed upon; one, joint U.S.-Panamanian control of the Canal; two, joint construction of a new, sea-level canal; three, U.S. defense of the old and the new canal for a specified period of time. Action was never taken by either nation, attributed in part to the fact that both nations were then involved in major election campaigns. In August 1970, the government of General Omar Torrijos, in power as a result of a military coup in 1968, formerly rejected the draft treaties.

Talks resumed in 1971. In March 1973, the U.S. vetoed a U.N. Security Council resolution referring to a new Panama Canal Treaty which would "guarantee full respect for Panama's effective sovereignty over all its territories" on the grounds that the Treaty negotiations were a bilateral matter. Shortly thereafter, serious negotiations were resumed. In February 1974, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Panamanian Foreign Minister Juan A. Tack signed an agreement of principles as the basis for the formal negotiations. The eight principles called for an entirely new treaty with a fixed termination date, thus ending the concept of perpetuity; the return to Panama of the territory in which the Canal is located; a "just and equitable" share for Panama of the benefits from the Canal; a role for Panama in administering the Canal during the life of the new Treaty and total responsibility for its operation upon termination of the Treaty; joint protection and defense of the Canal by the two countries; the rights necessary for the United States to regulate the flow of ships through the Canal and to operate, maintain and defend it; and provisions for the future enlargement of the waterway.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, being the lone dissenter on the Foreign Relations Committee, which has favorably reported the Panama Canal treaties by a vote of 14 to 1, I have filed minority views as part of the committee's report to the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the views were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS OF SENATOR ROBERT P. GRIFFIN

This has been one of the most difficult issues I have confronted in my 21 years in the Congress. I have long recognized that a major revision in our treaty relationship with the Republic of Panama is desirable and could be in the interests of both countries.

I recognize the importance of maintaining close and friendly relations with the people of Panama and with the people of other nations throughout the hemisphere. I am deeply conscious of, and concerned about, the impact that outright rejection of the treaties could have on our relations in the hemisphere.

Sometimes political responsibility imposes upon public officials the necessity of choosing among several undesirable courses of action. That may seem to be the dilemma that we face with these treaties.

After months of agonizing consideration, I have concluded that I cannot consent to ratification of the treaties before us. I think they are fatally flawed in a number of substantive respects. In my view they do not adequately protect the interests of the United States or of other nations that depend upon the Canal.

Furthermore, I believe the defects are so basic and so serious that they cannot be remedied by trying to rewrite the treaties on the Senate floor.

Although these treaties should not be ratified, I believe there is a course open to the Senate other than outright rejection. Despite all of his knowledge about the history of the Canal, or perhaps because of it, David McCullough, the distinguished author of The Path Between the Seas acknowledged before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that he had experienced great difficulty in reaching a personal decision about the merit of these treaties. Although he finally decided, on balance, to support the treaties, when he appeared before the Committee he made this profound and perceptive point:

"... if we say 'yes' to these [treaties] in a grudging way ... [because we think] we have painted ourselves into a corner and we have to get out ... [that would be] unfortunate ... [and] just as wrong, and in some ways a greater mistake than to say 'no' in the spirit of saying 'no' because [it should be] done right—because we don't want to have to come back in 15 or 20 years and have to do it all over again."¹

Under the Constitution, of course, the Senate's role is one of "advice and consent." Instead of consenting to these treaties, I believe it would be a wiser course for the Senate to exercise only its "advice" authority. In other words, without rejecting the treaties outright, the Senate in this instance ought to advise the President to send the negotiators back to the drawing boards with instructions to persist until a more acceptable treaty can be fashioned.

As I said in a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, I respect our two Senate leaders and my colleagues who have reached a contrary conclusion—those who are convinced in their own minds that these treaties do serve the best interests of the nation. I salute them for having the courage of their convictions, because I believe with Edmund Burke that a senator owes his constituents his judgment and should not sacrifice it to public opinion alone.

However, I also believe that when the call on the merits of an issue is as close as this is, or as close as I perceive it to be, the judgment of the people ought not to be taken lightly. Very honestly and frankly, I have come to the conclusion that in this situation, as so often is the case, the people are right.

I. THE CANAL AND U.S. SECURITY

Military experts may disagree as to the advisability of ratifying these treaties, but there is general agreement that the Panama Canal is vital to the security of the United States.

Indeed, as the Soviet Navy continues to grow larger and larger, while our own Navy shrinks, the Canal becomes more—not less—important.

If access to the Canal were denied to U.S. naval vessels, the trip from ocean to ocean would involve an 8,000 mile journey around Cape Horn—an extra 17 days for a warship traveling at 20 knots.²

In 1968 the United States had 976 naval ships. Today that figure has been cut by more than half—to 459. In 1974, when the Soviet fleet was smaller than it is today, our Joint Chiefs of Staff asserted that we need more than 800 ships to “support our current national defense strategy.”³

Furthermore, as far as U.S. naval strength is concerned, it appears that things will get worse before they get better. Writing in the January 4, 1978, issue of the Baltimore Sun, Charles W. Corddry wrote:

The [Carter Administration] request for shipbuilding funds in fiscal 1979 is to be cut 20 per cent below the $5.8 billion that Congress provided for this year after doing some pruning of its own. . . . The Navy goal of expanding the fleet from its present 459 ships to more than 500 in the early 1980s now may be as elusive as the onetime target of 660 became. Officials acknowledge that the fleet will shrink further before there is an upturn in numbers.

In contrast, the Soviet Navy by 1975 had grown to 1,200 vessels—although, admittedly, their ships do not compare with ours in tonnage or combat effectiveness.⁴

The sobering fact is, however, that the rapidly expanding Soviet Navy raises real concerns about future control of the maritime “choke points” of the world—one of which is the Panama Canal.⁵

As Admiral Thomas Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has testified, we do not have a two-ocean Navy. “A large majority of our war and contingency plans are totally infeasible unless one assumes that full and priority use of the canal will be available,”⁶ said Admiral Moorer.

It's true that our aircraft carriers, of which we have 13, are too large to transit the Canal. But the United States has a Navy, that is effective in both major oceans precisely because the rest of the Navy, particularly supply and support ships for the aircraft carriers, are able to shuttle between the oceans through the Canal.

Of course, we can only speculate about the real intentions of the Soviet Union and its Caribbean proxy, Cuba, with respect to the Canal. But few would argue against the proposition that it will be a tragic blow to U.S. and free world security if the Panama Canal should fall into Communist hands.

Since as far back as the 1959 Panama riots, there has been reason for concern about the covetous eye of Castro. For example, the New York Times wrote then about the “obvious influence Cuban revolutionaries were exerting on crowds that eventually formed mobs.” The Times noted:

Banners and insignia were largely dedicated to endorsement of Premier Fidel Castro and the Cuban revolutionary movement. Two Cuban newsmen were continuously in the forefront of the most violent group, urging it on toward the Canal Zone.⁷

Evidence of Cuban influence may have been less obvious in recent years, but it also is true at the moment Castro has his hands full in Africa.

On June 8, 1977, four of the nation's most respected naval leaders (Retired Admirals Robert Carney, George Anderson, Arleigh Burke and Thomas Moorer)—each of whom has served as Chief of Naval Operations—wrote to President Carter and forcefully expressed concerns about the treaties then being negotiated. They wrote, in part:

⁷ New York Times, November 30, 1959. Both U.S. Senator Mike Mansfield (Congressional Research Service [hereafter CRS], Library of Congress, Background Documents Relating to the Panama Canal, Prepared for the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 95th Congress, 1st Session [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, November 1977], p. 978), and Panama's National Police Chief (ibid., p. 967), recognized a communist role in the 1949 student riots. Following the 1964 riots, Ambassador Elsworth Bunker—then U.S. Representative on the Council of the Organization of American States—called for an investigation and asserted:

* * * Contrary to what we read about the declining strategic and economic value of the Canal, the truth is that this interoceanic waterway is as important, if not more so, to the United States than ever.

The existing maritime threat to us is compounded by the possibility that the Canal under Panamanian sovereignty could be neutralized or lost depending on that government's relationship with other nations. We note that the present Panamanian government has close ties with the present Cuban government which in turn is closely tied to the Soviet Union. Loss of the Panama Canal, which would be a serious setback in war, would contribute to the encirclement of the United States by hostile naval forces, and threaten our ability to survive.*

Adequacy of the proposed treaties

During the 1976 presidential campaign, candidate Jimmy Carter told the voters: I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone. (Emphasis supplied)*

The treaties negotiated shortly after President Carter assumed office, and which now are before the Senate, not only turn the Canal over to Panama in the year 2000, but also they would turn practical—if not complete—control of the Canal Zone over to Panama 30 months after the treaties became effective. The treaties become effective six months following ratification, so Panama would take effective control of the Canal Zone 36 months, or three years, following ratification.

If we accept the decision to turn the Canal over to Panama in the year 2000, still our security interests require, in my view, that the treaties be rewritten to include certain fundamental safeguards:

We need more control and jurisdiction between now and the year 2000 to insure that we will be able effectively to operate and defend the Canal.

We must have the right, in unambiguous terms, beyond the year 2000 to use military force, if necessary, to protect the neutrality of the Canal against any threat—even a domestic Panamanian threat.

We need to maintain our option to negotiate for construction of a second (perhaps sea level) and outside of Panama, should that prove necessary because of Panamanian intransigence, or desirable because of economic or security considerations.

The Panama Canal Treaty

Of course, under the existing 1903 Treaty, the United States exercises within the 10-mile-wide strip of land known as the Panama Canal Zone:

* * * [A]ll the rights, power and authority * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory * * * to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.¹⁰

Conceding that the United States is not sovereign—but has all the rights, power, and authority as if it were sovereign—the point is that such control is important and, in my view, essential to the effective operation and maintenance of the Canal by the United States between now and the year 2000.

Under the proposed treaty, the United States would have the responsibility to operate the Canal during the next 23 years with employees—U.S. and Panamanians—who would be subject (even while performing their duties with respect to the Canal) to the laws, the police and the courts of Panama.¹¹

Instead of solving problems, this arrangement is pregnant with the seeds of acrimony and conflict.

Under the treaty, persons employed by the Panama Canal Commission would be “employees of the United States”; they would have the right to be represented by unions and to “negotiate collective contracts.”¹² If disputes arose—and that would not be unusual in labor relations—how would they be resolved?

Under the treaty arrangement, the Commission itself would be immune from suit in the courts of Panama, and could be sued only in the U.S. District Court in

Louisiana—something of an inconvenience for employees in Panama who claim back pay for discrimination or who have any other claims against the Commission.¹³

How would the Commission enforce legal obligations undertaken by others—a union, for example? Apparently, such matters would be left to the Panamanian courts. Would they apply United States law or Panamanian law?

Panamanian civil and criminal jurisdiction would extend throughout the strip now known as the Canal Zone. One exception is provided with respect to criminal jurisdiction applicable to our military personnel who would be stationed on the four U.S. bases that would remain after ratification.¹⁴ However, even that exception would be subject to the following provision:

... (5)(c)(iii) when charged with murder, rape, robbery with violence, trafficking in drugs, or crimes against the security of the Panamanian State, the accused shall be handed over to Panamanian authorities upon their request, or if already in their custody, shall remain with them. (Emphasis supplied)¹⁵

It's no wonder that many U.S. military and civilian personnel who now work in the Zone are deeply concerned about this and other parts of the arrangement.

Outside the boundaries of our four remaining military bases, of course, U.S. military and civilian personnel would be subject at all times to arrest and prosecution by Panamanian police in Panamanian courts.¹⁶

We are assured by the State Department that arrested U.S. personnel in Panama would be protected by a "status of forces" type agreement set forth in Annex D, which is similar to agreements we have with Japan and certain NATO countries where U.S. forces are stationed.¹⁷

Annex D does recite that such U.S. citizens charged with crime in a Panamanian court would have the right to a "prompt and speedy trial," protection against involuntary confessions, self-incrimination, and the like. But the decision on what constitutes a "speedy trial" or an "involuntary confession" will be left, once again, to the Panamanian courts.

For years, Soviet citizens have been "guaranteed" human rights by the Constitution of the Soviet Union. The only problem, of course, is that officials of the Soviet Union pay no attention to them.

That allusion would be unfair and out of order if the Panamanian Government under General Torrijos had a good record of observing human rights in Panama. However, despite the fact that similar "guarantees" are set forth in the Constitution of Panama, last year the Torrijos government had the worst human rights record of any country in this hemisphere, except Cuba.¹⁸ Indeed, in this respect, Panama was rated by Freedom House as being about par with the Soviet Union.¹⁹

Our "status of forces" agreements in other situations have worked reasonably well, perhaps because the host country has wanted the continued presence of our U.S. troops. Obviously, if a NATO ally didn't appreciate our military presence, and asked us to leave—we would.

In contrast, our troops are—and would be—stationed in the Canal Zone because we have a treaty right to protect the Canal. Under the new treaty—at least in theory—our right to have troops there until the year 2000 would not depend on the continuing permission of General Torrijos or any successor.

In that kind of setting, it seems to me there is reason for concern about the adequacy of the protection in Annex D accorded U.S. citizens.

In a country where anti-Americanism has a proven political value,²⁰ and where courts may be heavily influenced by the ruler in power, one is left to wonder whether such a treaty arrangement would be used as the basis for harassing U.S. military and civilian personnel to force them out of the country.

Because many U.S. citizens (as well as some black Panamanians) who now work in the Canal Zone are deeply concerned about their human rights if the new treaty should be ratified, morale among such employees is "very poor."²¹ Many of these employees indicate that they will leave if these treaties are approved; one recent poll indicated that more than 60 percent of U.S. civilians in the Zone consider themselves in that category.²²

According to Gen. H. R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, there are at least 1,000 highly skilled U.S. citizens whose services are absolutely essential and for whom Panamanian replacements could not be trained in the short term. In this category are 210 ship pilots, all but two of whom are U.S. citizens.²³

In view of the great importance of keeping the Canal open, it would be ironic as well as tragic if the Senate, by approving these treaties, should trigger an exodus that closes down the Canal.

The Neutrality Treaty

The "primary responsibility" of the United States to protect the Panama Canal would end with expiration of the Canal Treaty on December 31, 1999. After that date, only the second treaty—the Neutrality Treaty—would remain in effect.²⁴

Prior to the year 2000, while both treaties would be in effect, deficiencies in the Neutrality Treaty provisions for Canal security would be masked by the stronger language of the Panama Canal Treaty.

However, since the Neutrality Treaty would stand alone after termination of the Canal Treaty, its provisions must be very carefully examined now.

One key provision is Article One of the Neutrality Treaty, which recites:

The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral * * * (Emphasis supplied)

Obviously, this is only a unilateral declaration by Panama—rather than a joint commitment by the two countries—and it would be difficult to base any U.S. defense move after the year 1999 on this language.

Perhaps a U.S. role after 1999 can be inferred—but certainly it was not spelled out—in the language of Article IV, which reads:

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

This language, while obviously vague and ambiguous, is seized upon by many who promote the treaties as a guarantee that " * * * the United States will have the permanent right to defend the Canal from any threat."²⁵

The vague language of Article IV is further qualified by Article V, which reads:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty (in 1999), only the Republic of Panama shall * * * maintain military forces * * * within its national territory. (Emphasis supplied)

Surely, a principal purpose of any treaty ought to be to prevent or settle disagreements, not create them. If the parties disagree from the outset on the meaning of important provisions, a treaty is doomed to failure—even if it is ratified.

On the vital issue of the right of the United States under Article IV to intervene and defend the neutrality of the Canal with military force, if necessary, major disagreements have existed between U.S. and Panamanian negotiators, and those disagreements have continued even after the signing of the treaties.

We owe it to ourselves—and to our children who would have to suffer the consequences of our mistakes—to understand the depth of these disagreements and their grave implications for the future if left unresolved.

Accordingly, it is not only instructive but essential to scrutinize and compare carefully the public statements of American and Panamanian officials on this crucial point.

For example, on July 29, 1977, chief Panamanian negotiator Romulo Escobar told a Panama City press conference:

* * * we can tell you that the draft neutrality pact between our two countries does not make the U.S. a guarantor of * * * neutrality * * * U.S. intervention within the neutrality pact would take place only if another power attacked Panama.²⁶

On August 19, after negotiations were completed and the treaties had been initiated, Dr. Escobar reported to the Panamanian National Assembly: 30We did not give in either to the Americans' insistence that the United States and Panama jointly declare the neutrality of the Canal. We said the declaration of the Canal's neutrality was an act relating to Panama's sovereignty, and that it would have to be a unilateral declaration. * * * [W]ith the neutrality pact, we are not giving the United States the right of intervention. What we are giving is an assurance that the Canal will be permanently neutral. * * *

When the Committee began hearings on these treaties on September 26, 1977, this interpretation was called to the attention of the U.S. negotiators and the Secretary of State. The following exchange transpired:

Senator CASE. A point has been made that the Panamanian negotiators are telling the Panamanians that this does not give the United States the right to intervene in protecting the neutrality of the canal. * * * I wish you would corroborate me in this as to our right to intervene as opposed to our power to do it.

Secretary VANCE. * * * I think our right to do so is clear, and there can be no question about it.²⁹

Later, when asked about the Escobar statement, Ambassador Linowitz told the Committee:

We know of these statements. We are disturbed by them. We have discussed them with our Panamanian colleagues. I don't think you will hear such statements again.³⁰

The Ambassador's words were not prophetic. Only four days later another member of the Panamanian negotiating team, Carlos Lopez-Guevara, said on Panamanian television:

I have heard it said that the United States has the right to intervene in Panama after the year 2000. It is sad to see highly responsible officials in the United States say that this neutrality treaty grants the right of intervention. It is sad to note this inconsistency * * * because there is nothing in this treaty to serve as a basis for such a claim.³¹

An effort to end some of the ambiguity was made on October 14, 1977, when President Carter and General Torrijos issued an unsigned Joint Statement of Understanding, which read in part:

Under the Treaty [of Neutrality] * * * Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal * * *

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.³²

While clearly an improvement over the actual treaty text, the Joint Statement itself was not without its own ambiguities.

As if to emphasize this, on the day the statement was released, General Torrijos provided an interpretation not inconsistent with the earlier position taken by Dr. Escobar. According to the Washington Star:

Torrijos left Washington yesterday afternoon. In a brief airport news conference, the general said through an interpreter that he did not agree to anything that would permit a foreign country to intervene in Panama. Any leader who would permit such a thing, he continued, should not be trusted.

Torrijos indicated that the United States had a right to defend the canal if attacked by a great power.

Linowitz was later asked about this qualification, which had been attributed to Torrijos in news accounts.

The U.S. negotiator said that as the language of the statement of understanding indicated, the United States had a right to defend the canal against any threat or aggression from whatever quarter.³³

Senator Baker asked if the negotiators could obtain a statement in writing from the Panamanian Government saying that the Escobar remarks at the August 22, 1977, press conference "is not the position of the Panamanian Government." Ambassador Linowitz responded: "We will try. We will ask for it." I am advised by Committee staff that no statement was provided.

The situation was further complicated when General Torrijos arrived back in Panama and remarked, "I haven't even signed an autograph"—at least implicitly suggesting that the unsigned statement was of questionable legal validity.³³

Four days after the release of the joint Statement of Understanding, Dr. Escobar discussed it at a press conference. Far from conceding that it represented a different interpretation of U.S. rights after 1999 than the one he had provided earlier, he asserted that "what they have said is what has been said all along."³⁴ Of particular interest, the Panamanian chief negotiator stated:

Why did the problem arise? Because some Senators in the United States maintained that the language used in Article IV effectively gave the United States the right of defense against attacks on the Panama Canal in violation of the Neutrality Treaty. They extended this to mean that, as a consequence of this right of defense, they had the right to intervene in the Republic of Panama.

On the other hand, ever since the first public and official explanation in our country on 19 August, we said . . . that the scope of this right of defense at no time could be extended to mean the right to intervene within the Republic of Panama.³⁵

Surprisingly, the suggestion that the dispute had been caused by members of the United States Senate, rather than by the Panamanian negotiator, was endorsed the next day by Ambassador Linowitz. Reversing his earlier position that Dr. Escobar had misstated the terms of the treaty, Mr. Linowitz told the Foreign Relations Committee on October 19:

We believe that there never was disagreement between the responsible chiefs of state of both countries as to what the treaties meant. Had the issue not been raised here, sir, we don't think it would have been necessary to have this statement of understanding.³⁶

Nevertheless, the next day, by contrast, Ambassador Linowitz continued to assure the Committee that the U.S. had the right to protect the neutrality of the Canal even from a Panamanian threat.

He had this exchange with Chairman Sparkman:

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Will the statement limit our response to a threat to the neutrality of the Canal from the Government or people of Panama?

Ambassador LINOWITZ. No, sir. There is no limitation in this statement with reference to the action which the United States may undertake to counter any threat or aggression against the canal and its neutrality.³⁷

Later during that hearing, the same issue was raised by Senator Stone:

Senator STONE. The problem is that the Joint Statement says "internal." If the Panamanians say this is an internal dispute we have going here, do we then have the right to intervene?

Ambassador LINOWITZ. If the issue is maintaining an open, secure, and accessible canal, the United States is authorized to take such actions as it thinks necessary, and there is no qualification limitation as to where that threat comes from. * * *

Since there is no limitation, it obviously would not exclude any action which involves a Panamanian threat to the canal.³⁸

That same day, however, this interpretation was questioned by the American Law Division of the Library of Congress' Congressional Research Service, which concluded:

* * * [T]he Carter-Torrijos statement, while guaranteeing each party the right to act against threats directed at the Canal, also specifies that the U.S. may not intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action. (Emphasis supplied)³⁹

The following day, October 20—three days before Panama's national plebiscite on the proposed treaties—General Torrijos addressed the Panamanian people on nationwide radio and television.

He said that prior to the release of the Joint Statement he talked with President Carter, who assured him that the United States has no interest in intervening in the peaceful existence of Panama. According to Torrijos, President Carter said:

Tell your people * * * that in case the Canal is attacked or threatened, or if the free circulation or transit * * * is endangered, we do want to have the right to support that people so that their principal natural resource is not blocked.

Then I told him: "Well, that is the way I see it, too. I feel you are obliged—obliged—to come and defend us if our military or defense capacity is insufficient compared with the attacking force."

He said: "Well, that is where the difference lies. You say obliged, but here I have to sell this as having the right to do so. We feel the same, we are saying the same thing."⁴⁰

Repeatedly, General Torrijos assured his Panamanian radio and TV audience that the role of the United States under the Neutrality Treaty was to defend the Canal from foreign aggression if requested by Panama. Thus, he said:

"* * * [I]f we are attacked by superior forces, the United States is obligated to come to our defense."

"* * * [I]t is necessary for the United States to be committed so that when we ring the bell here, when we push the button, a bell rings over there, and the United States comes in defense of the Panama Canal." * * *

I repeat, we push the button, the bell rings, and the United States is obligated to come to our defense." (Emphasis supplied)⁴¹

This statement by General Torrijos highlights yet another crucial disagreement between the two negotiating teams. Specifically, can a determination that the Canal's neutrality has been threatened or violated be made unilaterally by the United States, or is U.S. action dependent upon a prior agreement with Panama that neutrality is in jeopardy?

Nearly two months earlier, during an August 22 press conference, Dr. Escobar said:

The neutrality pact does not provide that the United States will say when neutrality is violated. That is not provided there. There is an article which reads that Panama and the United States will maintain the neutrality pact with the purpose that the Canal remain open peacefully for all ships of all flags of the world. That is all it says. It does not say that it falls to the United States to decide when neutrality is violated or not. (Emphasis supplied)⁴²

On September 26, this position was challenged by Ambassador Linowitz, who—in his prepared statement to the Committee on Foreign Relations—asserted:

Under the treaty the United States is in a position to assure that the Canal's permanent neutrality is maintained and there is no limitation on our ability to take such action as we may deem necessary in the event the Canal's neutrality is threatened or violated from any source." * * *

But the key point is that it is for the United States to make the determination as to how we should respond and how we should defend our rights under the Canal's regime of permanent neutrality.

"* * * We are under no obligation to consult with or seek approval from any other nation or international body before acting to maintain the neutrality of the canal nor does the treaty in any other way limit our ability to act. (Emphasis supplied.)"⁴³

Once again, following the October 14 Carter-Torrijos "understanding," it became clear that the two sides still had not reached agreement. On October 18, Dr. Escobar told a press conference:

"There is no exact method of interpretation on how violations of the neutrality treaty will be determined." * * * The general treaty includes an article which states that in case of a discrepancy between the two sides concerning the interpretation of an article, they will reach an agreement between themselves or, if necessary, they will appoint an arbiter to decide the issue. This is the general way these situations are handled."⁴⁴

On this record, it is painfully obvious that the United States and Panama have been in disagreement—and still disagree, despite the October 14 Carter-Torrijos "understanding"—on at least two major points:

Our Administration tells the American people that the United States will have the right to defend the Canal after the year 2000 against any threat to its neutrality, including an internal threat from within Panama. But spokesmen for Panama assert that the United States will have such a right only if the Canal is threatened by a foreign power.

Our Administration tells the American people that the U.S. can determine unilaterally when such a right to defend the Canal can be exercised. But Panamanian spokesmen insist that U.S. forces can come in only when requested or when the action is agreed to by Panama.

We would be living in a fool's paradise to assume that these contradictory interpretations will simply go away if the treaty is ratified. Indeed, we would be most fortunate if they did not come back to haunt us in a most agonizing way.

If, at some future time, we genuinely believed that the neutrality of security of the Canal is being threatened by a third party—and Panama, for whatever reason, disagrees—what would we do?

Or if we became convinced that Panama itself (or forces within Panama) were violating the Canal's neutrality or endangering its security—and we could not persuade Panama to change its course—what would we do?

Would we feel compelled to stand by and watch while the Panama Canal fell into hostile hands?

Or would we be justified in using military force to protect the Canal even in the face of Panamanian protest or, perhaps, outright resistance and military confrontation?

These questions are not easy, and there are no simple answers. It is essential that we avoid being placed in such a dilemma—by resolving in advance of ratification such ambiguities and misunderstandings, which contain the seeds of future agony.

If we fail—or if we try to paper over serious deficiencies and disagreements for short-term political expediency—we could be buying ourselves a one-way ticket to another Vietnam.

II. THE NEW CANAL OPTION

If the security and economic interests of the United States are to be protected, we should not relinquish our option to negotiate for construction of a second canal (possibly a sea level canal in a country other than Panama).

That's exactly what we would do under Article XII of the proposed Canal Treaty, which reads in part:

(b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree. (Emphasis supplied)

In exchange for our commitment not to build a new canal in any other country, what would we get in return under the proposed treaty?

The Administration says we would get a commitment that Panama will not collaborate with any other nation to build a second canal in Panama.⁴⁶ Whether that would be a fair exchange is open to serious question. But beyond that, there are three important points to be made: (1) the language of the new treaty does not say that; (2) we already have such a guarantee under the existing 1903 treaty; and (3) the existing guarantee would be wiped out if we were to ratify the proposed treaty.

In exchange for our clear and unambiguous commitment not to build a new canal in any other country, Panama would be "bound" by the following language in Article XII:

* * * during the duration of the Treaty, both parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms agreeable to both parties for its construction. (Emphasis supplied)

It isn't necessary to take a high school course in business law to realize that, under such language, Panama would be obligated only to "study" and to "negotiate." There is no clear and unambiguous commitment there—or anywhere else in the treaty—that would preclude Panama's joining with a nation other than the United States to construct a second, or sea level, canal in Panama.

Subsection 2(a) of Article XII does say that—

No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the Republic of Panama during the duration of this Treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty, or as the two parties may otherwise agree.

At worse, this language is meaningless. At best, it is fuzzy and ambiguous.

If Panama acts "in accordance with" the treaty, it is under no prohibition with respect to the construction of a second canal. It is required only to "study jointly" and to "negotiate" with the United States concerning the Canal.

Under this language, it might be claimed that the United States has sort of a "first option"—but it is a pretty weak claim under the language employed.

Even though the existing Canal is not obsolete, we must look toward the day when it will no longer be adequate.

The dream of a sea level canal—without locks—ought to be more than a dream in an era when men and women are going to the moon.

⁴⁶ Ibid., pt. I, pp. 46-47.

Studies have indicated that the least expensive place to build a second canal would be in Panama. But, for political and other reasons, it might be very wise to construct the second canal in another country—even though it might cost a few billion dollars more.

Furthermore, perhaps such a canal should be built under the auspices of the Organization of American States or some other arrangement of international interests.

In a study published under the auspices of the Council on Foreign Relations in 1967, Immanuel J. Klette surveyed various canal options and concluded that, if nuclear excavation were prohibited, the preferable route for a new canal would be the Nicaragua-Costa Rica route.⁴⁶ He observed:

Although the cost of construction bears on the final choices, it should not be the prime factor in making decisions on a new canal. A waterway which is less expensive in dollars may be the most expensive in political consequences.⁴⁷

As we move toward a new treaty relationship with Panama, we should not ignore the value of competition—economic, political, and even diplomatic.

Holding open even the possibility of building a new canal outside of Panama—an option foreclosed by the proposed treaty—could be very important and useful in our relations with Panama.

After all, for the foreseeable future, Panama's economic survival is dependent on the Panama Canal. As Professor Edwin C. Hoyt observed several years ago in the Virginia Journal of International Law:

If Panama is too intransigent, she may lose the [sea level] canal to one of these other countries. This would be an economic disaster for Panama.⁴⁸

Furthermore, if a canal were constructed elsewhere in Latin America, Panama would be forced to keep its own tolls competitive or risk losing most of the traffic to its almost certainly more modern rival.

A major conference on Panama sponsored by Georgetown University's Center for Strategic Studies in 1967 reached a number of conclusions, one of which was:

Though the Republic of Panama seems technically to be the best place for a future canal facility, the United States should not abandon the right to approach other countries for possible canal location in the event that future political conditions exclude the project from Panama.⁴⁹

Under the circumstances, it is difficult to conclude that Article XII of the proposed Canal treaty serves the best interests of the United States.

III. SOME ECONOMIC CONCERNS

Importance of the Canal

When he testified before the Committee, Ambassador Sol Linowitz asserted that the Canal has "to a substantial extent become economically obsolescent."⁵⁰ That is the view of many who support the treaties.

Of course, it is true that modern-day "supertankers" are too large to transit the Canal. But it also is true that none of the coastal ports of the United States is able to accommodate the supertankers.

A variety of facts and statistics can be summoned to suggest that the Canal is rapidly losing its economic importance to the United States. Sometimes the point is buttressed by noting that the number of commercial U.S.-flag vessels transiting the Canal has decreased substantially during the past two decades.⁵¹

But the fact is that most cargo going to or from U.S. ports is carried in vessels that are not U.S.-flag carriers. The tonnage of U.S. cargo transiting the Canal actually has increased during the last two decades by more than 300 per cent.⁵²

Careful analysis underscores that the Panama Canal remains economically very important, both to the United States and to world commerce in general.

Writing in the Washington Star (Dec. 16, 1977), Prof. William C. Davis argued: "What we need most is flexibility to negotiate—to play off one country against another. With this leverage, we should be able to construct a new canal at reasonable costs."

⁵² Ibid., pt. I, p. 339, 356.

Consider a few statistics

Between 1948 and 1976, cargo tonnage moving through the Canal increased almost 400 per cent.⁵⁵ That upward trend continued during fiscal year 1977.⁵⁶

About 93 per cent of the world fleet of 27,000 ships of 1,000 gross registered tons and over are capable of transiting the Canal.⁵⁷

At least 96 per cent of U.S. merchant ships and more than 98 per cent of our naval vessels can use the Canal.⁵⁸

At least 57 per cent of all the tonnage passing through the Canal is shipped from, or is destined for, United States ports.⁵⁹

The Canal is particularly important to producers and consumers of certain American commodities—for example, Alaskan oil shipped through the Canal to refineries on the East and Gulf Coasts, and farm products bound for foreign and domestic markets. Twenty per cent of all U.S. farm exports pass through the Canal.

A study by the U.S. Maritime Administration concluded if the Canal were closed the price of U.S. exports would be increased by $932 million and the price of imports would be increased by $583 million.⁶⁰

While the Canal is important to the United States, relatively speaking, it is even more important to some other countries. For example, Japan probably is more dependent on the Canal than is the United States,⁶¹ and several Latin American nations rely on the waterway for more than half of their foreign commerce.⁶²

Not only is the Canal economically important, but also transits are projected to increase in the years to come. Canal Zone Governor H. R. Parfitt has testified that transits probably will increase about 40 per cent by the year 2000.⁶³

Self-sustaining or profitmaking

While the United States (along with much of the rest of the world) certainly has benefitted from the existence of the Panama Canal, it has not been—and never was intended by the United States to be—a profit-making venture. On the contrary, according to calculations by Arthur Anderson & Company, unrecovered U.S. investments in the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone Government has exceeded $3 billion.⁶⁴

In his recent book, The Panama Canal Controversy, Paul Ryan wrote:

The United States government, in a strictly bookkeeping sense, has never made a profit on the Panama Canal and in fact, beginning in the 1970s, has lost money on its operation. It was President Theodore Roosevelt's goal that the international waterway be devoted to the common good of mankind, and for over sixty years ships of all nations enjoyed safe, secure transit and paid the same low tolls.⁶⁵

In fact, the refusal of the United States to view the Canal as an economically profitable venture has been a cause of some friction in our relations with Panama.

Former Assistant Secretary of State and Ambassador Thomas C. Mann has observed:

The main thing to be said is that Panama and the U.S. have entirely different concepts about the role of the Canal. Panama has always aspired to sole control . . . for the purpose of maximizing revenues from the Canal to it; for the purpose of charging all that the traffic will bear for the right of transit. The United States . . . has had two objectives: first, to keep transit tolls as low as possible so as not to add to the cost of goods that must transit the Canal; second, ability of the United States ships to transit the Canal in peace and in war and on a non-discriminatory basis.⁶⁶

This difference of approach was even reflected in testimony by Transportation Secretary Brock Adams, who told the Committee that after the year 2000 he thought the Panamanians "will try to get out of the [Canal] passage their operating costs and to obtain the amounts of money that will not only cover it but give them a profit."⁶⁵

If Panama should try to extract a profit from the Canal, perhaps it would not be surprising.

Since General Torrijos came to power in 1968, Panama's national debt has grown from $167 million to about $1.5 billion—an increase of nearly 900 percent—giving the country the dubious honor of having the highest per capita debt in Latin America.⁶⁶

Between 1975 and 1977, under General Torrijos' leadership, the interest on Panama's debt has increased from $138 million to $243 million—a jump of more than 75 percent in just two years.⁶⁷

Nowhere in the treaties does Panama make a commitment to maintain the Canal—least of all out of revenues. We are left to hope that, in its own self-interest, it would do so. But a future government of Panama might well decide that the tolls would be better used for social programs than for the cost of maintaining the Canal—maintenance which is enormously expensive as well as highly technical.⁶⁸

Financing canal operations

Some who seek to sell the new treaties to the American people have portrayed the economic provisions as painless and cost-free.

They assert that tolls from the Canal will cover not only its operating costs, without subsidy by American taxpayers, but also the cost of specified payments, which the treaties categorically require the United States to make to Panama.

On the first day of Senate hearings, for example, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance assured the committee that "the treaties require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayers."⁶⁹

Similarly, President Carter, in his fireside chat on February 1, 1978, gave this assurance:

Are we paying Panama to take the Canal? We are not. Under the new treaties payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the Canal.⁷⁰

The best that can be said for such simplistic assurances is that they are optimistic to the point of naivete.

Current payments made to Panama under the existing treaty amount to $2.3 million a year. Under the new Canal treaty, our annual payments would be increased by about 3,000 per cent.⁷¹

Just what would go into this 3,000 per cent increase?

The annual payment from tolls would go up from $2.3 million to $50 million to $70 million.⁷²

The treaty calls for a fixed annuity of another $10 million.⁷³

In addition, the treaty provides up to $10 million more to be paid out of revenues if they exceed expenses.⁷⁴

Beyond that, we would pay $10 million a year to Panama for police, fire and other municipal services—and these costs can be negotiated upward every three years.⁷⁵

Outside these provisions of the treaty, if Congress concurs with President Carter's commitment, Panama will receive various types of loans, guarantees and credits

This was amended to $430,000 by Article VII of the 1936 Treaty, and again to $1.93 million by the 1955 Treaty. Because the payments were designated in Panamanian balboas, instead of U.S. dollars, subsequent devaluations of the American dollar have raised the annuity to $2,328,200.

⁷² Article XIII (4)(a) of the Panama Canal Treaty. The actual payment under this provision will vary dependent upon the total tonnage transiting the waterway. Because the payment is indexed to the U.S. inflation rate, this payment can be expected to increase at regular intervals in the years to come.

totaling about $300 million over the next 10 years—plus $50 million worth of military hardware.⁷⁶

All this is beyond the fact that we would be giving Panama the Canal itself and all related facilities (valued well in excess of $1 billion), and giving them the Panama Railroad—all without any reimbursement or recompense.

Notwithstanding all of this, President Carter told the American people on December 28: "We wanted a treaty that did not put a financial burden on the American taxpayer, and we got it."⁷⁷

In theory—but only in theory—these treaty obligations will be paid out of Canal revenues. But it is clear that until the year 2000 the United States is obligated to meet these financial commitments with appropriated funds, if necessary, should revenues from tolls fall short.

Since Article III (2)(d) of the Panama Canal Treaty grants to the United States until the year 2000 the right to "[e]stablish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal," some may assume that such authority will be sufficient to avoid the need for appropriations.

Unfortunately, even with control of the checkbook, we have to face some stark realities.

During a 60-year period prior to 1974, there was never an increase in the toll charge for transiting the Canal.

Since 1974, however, because of the escalating costs of operating and maintaining the Canal, there have been two toll increases, totaling about 50 per cent.⁷⁸

If the treaties are ratified, even Administration witnesses concede that tolls will have to be hiked again—immediately—by 25 to 40 per cent.⁷⁹ Other experts predict that the increase will be as much as 46 per cent.⁸⁰

In a report prepared for the House Panama Canal Subcommittee in December, 1977, W. M. Whitman, an expert on the economics of the Canal, presented this disturbing analysis:

In the first year of operation under the treaty, Panama Canal revenues will fail to cover costs of operation of the canal and related treaty costs by about $99 million. [This] would require an increase in rates of tolls of more than 60 per cent * * *. * * * [T]he conclusion to be drawn from the data so far available is that costs will rise at a rate higher than any foreseeable increase in revenues over the period of operation of the Canal by the United States under the Treaty.

Constraints on our ability to raise tolls to keep pace with rising costs are both political and economic.

In view of the great emphasis placed by Administration spokesmen on the value of this treaty as a "positive action * * * in our relations with Latin America,"⁸¹ one must wonder how much thought has been given to the possible reactions in Latin America to such gigantic toll increases.

One would have expected, and our Latin American neighbors must have hoped, that before the Administration agreed to a treaty that would drive tolls up so dramatically in order to cover such a huge increase in our annual payments to Panama, more consideration would have been given to the 1977 resolution of the Organization of American States—adopted last June by a vote of 19 to 0 (with the U.S. abstaining and Panama not voting). The OAS resolution:

Reaffirms the principle that Panama Canal tolls should only reflect the operational cost of the waterway. (Emphasis supplied.)⁸²

Neither should we ignore the fact that the Panama Canal is not a monopoly. Other trade routes exist, and their appeal will increase as Canal tolls are raised.

Consider these excerpts from the prepared testimony to the House Panama Canal Subcommittee by Leonard J. Kujawa, a partner in Arthur Anderson & Company who since 1962 has been a consultant on various financial and accounting matters to the Panama Canal Company:

To those that argue that Panama Canal tolls can be increased significantly with no effect on traffic, I would say "prove it in the market place." * * *

Tolls must be adjusted moderately and prudently or there can be severe dislocations that would set into motion irrevocable economic consequences. In a short term, tolls could be increased very substantially creating economic hardship for the users who, in the short term, would have available few alternatives. However, such action would have serious long-term consequences. * * *

* * * [I]n the long term, an imprudent toll increase could sour traffic growth and set in motion irreversible decisions. Loss of traffic coupled with growth of costs could result in higher unit costs and the need for further toll increases, producing a vicious cycle that would result in eventual financial collapse.⁵³

Thus, despite the Administration's soothing reassurances, there is every reason to believe that even increased Canal tolls will not cover required treaty payments to Panama and sharply escalating operating costs, particularly after 1984 when it is likely that North Slope oil will bypass the Canal. In that unhappy—but likely—event, the American taxpayer will once again be stuck with the bill.

IV. OTHER CONCERNS

Beyond the points already discussed, there are a number of other disturbing concerns.

Although the Canal would be turned over to Panama under the proposed treaties in the year 2000, no firm obligation is undertaken by Panama to operate and maintain the Canal thereafter.

Notwithstanding testimony by Secretary of State Vance that Panama's obligation to do so is "clear,"⁵⁴ Panamanian negotiator Romulo Escobar has categorically stated that " * * * Panama could not be tied down to keeping open a canal which was not earning revenues."⁵⁵

For the United States, Ambassador Linowitz concluded:

We did disagree with them on the position they asserted and therefore that (commitment) was not included in the Treaty. The position we took was should such a circumstance arise, we would have to talk with one another.⁵⁶

There is only one ambiguous phrase in Article II that could even be used as the basis for implying an obligation on Panama to keep the Canal open after 2000. But our negotiators have conceded the point in statements such as that made by Ambassador Linowitz. This sets the stage for Panama after the year 2000 (particularly if we are precluded in the interim from building a second canal) to demand that the United States continue to subsidize the operation and maintenance of the Canal.

2. Would Panama be able to nationalize or expropriate the Canal shortly after ratification of the treaties—without waiting until the year 2000 to take control?

Under the existing 1903 Treaty, the U.S. has all rights, power and authority as if it were sovereign. Panama, under the existing treaty, cannot claim the sovereign power of eminent domain.

The proposed treaty would "wipe out" the 1903 Treaty and all the powers of sovereignty would become vested in Panama once the treaties are ratified.⁵⁷ We already have seen that the United States would have no clear right to intervene if the canal were the subject of a take-over by Panama itself.

The Suez comparison is worth some reflection. One month after the British withdrew from the Suez Canal Zone in 1956, the Suez Canal Company was nationalized and Egypt kept the canal profits. And it also kept the canal—and kept it closed to Israeli shipping—despite treaty commitments, war with Israel, attack by Britain and France, condemnation by the United States, and a 1948 U.N. resolution demanding Israeli access to the canal.

While no forecast of similar action by Panama is intended, our negotiators might have avoided this risk by calling upon Panama, as an act of good faith, to surrender (in the terms of the proposed treaties) any right to nationalize or expropriate the Canal during the period between now and the year 2000.

3. In testimony before the Committee by a panel of international law scholars, concerns were expressed that the new treaties are not compatible with the Revised Charter of the Organization of American States.⁵⁸

⁵⁴ U.S. Senate, Hearings, pt. I, p. 60.

⁵⁵ Ibid., pt. I, pp. 59–60.

⁵⁷ Article II(a) of the Panama Canal Treaty.

⁵⁸ U.S. Senate, Hearings, pt. IV, pp. 92–93. Article 20 of the Revised OAS Charter reads: "The territory of a State is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly on any grounds whatever."

It was maintained that, at a minimum, the OAS Charter appears to make even more ambiguous and uncertain any claim under the Neutrality Treaty by the United States of a right to protect the Canal against a threat from within Panama. At the very least, legal conflicts between the OAS Charter and the proposed Neutrality Treaty appear to give Panama a basis for arguing that any introduction of U.S. military forces on Panamanian soil would violate Article 20 of the OAS Charter.

In light of all the problems of interpretation to be found within the four corners of the treaties themselves, this additional cause for uncertainty is not exactly needed.

4. Were these treaties negotiated in haste under the pressure of a time deadline? Because the treaties contain so much ambiguous language and so many provisions of doubtful merit, it is appropriate to ask such a question. And, unfortunately, there is reason for some concern.

On February 10, 1977, shortly after he took office, President Carter named Sol Linowitz to represent the United States as negotiator for the Panama Canal treaties. But, strangely, Mr. Linowitz was appointed only on a temporary basis—for a six month period. Under the law,⁸⁸ an appointment on this basis does not require confirmation by the Senate. Such an appointment operates to bypass the usual scrutiny by a Senate committee of a nominee's qualifications and possible conflicts of interest.

If hearings had been held, the Senate would have learned that Mr. Linowitz was serving as director of a New York bank that participated in making huge loans, still outstanding, to the Torrijos government of Panama.⁸⁹ Furthermore, the committee might have cleared the air with respect to allegations that Mr. Linowitz formerly represented the Marxist Allende government of Chile, and was required in connection therewith to register as an agent of a foreign government.⁹¹

Because the Senate is an integral part of the treaty-making process under the Constitution, it was unwise and something of an affront to the Senate for the Administration not to submit a treaty negotiator's name for confirmation. Utilizing such a short circuit procedure did not build Senate confidence in the treaty negotiations, and it also denied Mr. Linowitz the opportunity he should have had to explain away any possible conflicts of interest.

Mr. Linowitz, who was appointed on February 10, had six months—until August 10—to negotiate a new treaty without having his name submitted to the Senate for confirmation.

Interestingly enough, it was on August 10 that negotiators for the two countries finally announced their agreement in principle on new treaties relating to the Panama Canal.

CONCLUSION

Clearly, as submitted to the Senate by the President, these treaties are fatally flawed.

Any new treaty relationship built upon the ambiguities of the treaties now before us would be doomed to failure from the start.

It is argued by some that defects in the treaties can be remedied by adopting a series of amendments.

Along with David McCullough, I believe that how we say "no" in this situation is very important in terms of our future relations with the people of Panama.

To adopt amendments that make substantive changes in the text of the treaties is one way of saying "no." As the late Professor L. Oppenheim has pointed out: " * * * the proposal of an amendment to a treaty on the part of the Senate amounts to a proposal of a new treaty * * * ."⁹²

This is modified by Article 22, which provides: "Measures adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties do not constitute a violation of the principles set forth in Articles 18 and 20." (Emphasis supplied.)

Since the 1903 Treaty qualifies as an "existing" treaty, action taken to defend the Canal under its provisions is less likely to be in conflict with the OAS Charter than action under any new treaty.

If the Senate tries to make substantive changes in the text of the treaties—and particularly if General Torrijos should decide later to “accept” them without holding another plebiscite—the foundation would be laid for future Panamanian claims that the treaties are invalid because in their final form they were not properly ratified in accordance with Panama’s constitution.²³

In my judgment, the appropriate course for the Senate is to withhold its “consent”—and instead to “advise” the President to persist in negotiations until acceptable treaties can be fashioned.

ROBERT P. GRIFFIN.

GENERAL TORRIJOS TELEVISION ADDRESS

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, in my minority views which accompany the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the Panama Canal treaties (Ex. Rept. 95—12), I have quoted from an October 20, 1977, television and radio address to the Panamanian people delivered by Gen. Omar Torrijos.

Because it was delivered after the October 14 joint statement of understanding released by General Torrijos and President Carter, and shortly before the October 23 Panamanian plebiscite, I believe this lengthy speech provides important insight into the interpretations which General Torrijos and future Panamanian leaders are likely to give to key provisions of these treaties. And, as I have pointed out in my minority views, some of those interpretations are very disturbing.

In order that my colleagues will have access to the full text of the remarks delivered by General Torrijos on that occasion, I ask unanimous consent that a translation thereof by the Foreign Broadcast Information Service, provided by the Department of State, be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

TORRIJOS ADDRESSES NATION PRIOR TO TREATY PLEBISCITE

(Nationwide radio and TV conversation with the nation by Chief of Government Gen. Omar Torrijos at the Televisora Nacional TV studios in Panama City with Mario Valasquez as moderator—live.)

(Moderator) General Torrijos, welcome to Televisora Nacional, welcome to Panamanian television. For us it is a source of great pride and pleasure that you should be in our studios tonight to have this conversation with the Panamanian people—this friendly conversation, by which you show great interest in sending a message, in communicating your impressions of your trip to Europe. Would you be so kind, General Torrijos, to talk to us first about your trip to Europe? I understand that this was the first time that a Panamanian chief of government, a Panamanian ruler, has made a trip to Europe while in office.

(Answer) This is true. Following my return to the country after a trip of almost 20,000 km, I wish to use this media to resume our dialog, in which we have been engaged for 9 years. Our trip was very interesting. The traveler was not General Torrijos, but he was the representative of a people with a cause. When in the various countries I was addressed and the national anthem was played, I felt, in my deepest soul, that the national anthem was not being played for Omar, but the national anthem was being played for 1.7 million Panamanians who, through their struggle, through their principles, through many sacrifices, decided to end a shame-changes and, as such, even if acceptable to the President, require renewed negotiations to induce other signatories to accept them . . . Technically, of course, the Senate cannot amend a treaty, but it merely suggests changes which it requires to be incorporated before it will grant its consent to ratification.

²³ See Article 274 of the Constitution of Panama 1972 (Washington, D.C.: General Secretariat Organization of American States, 1974, p. 44), and Articles II(1) of the Panama Canal Treaty and VIII of the Treaty Concerning the Parliament Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

ful colonialist enclave and decided that international public opinion should never consider us a colony.

I was proud because now the name of Panama has been incorporated among those of the dignified countries of the world. I was proud because all the attention shown to me was attention which I was receiving on your behalf, and I was proud because our country is being heard at the highest levels, and it is being heard as a country which has issued a cry to the world, a cry which has been heard by the moral leaders of the most powerful and highly industrialized countries of the world.

I emerged from my meetings with optimism. I was optimistic because I went there with the timidity of one who is unfamiliar with this great world. I felt optimistic because in each of these leaders I found sincere support, an in-depth knowledge of our cause, and a profound conviction that the Panamanian people had exhausted all peaceful means of solving a problem. I received congratulations, which I hereby extend to you. I received congratulations from those great leaders because they say that Panama, despite its small geographical size, has given a very significant example—the use of peaceful means to resolve a problem, the use of negotiations as a means of settling a problem of great significance to the world. I had been very confused, and I had had the impression that this was a bilateral problem between Panama and the United States.

I return with a more complete idea of the significance of this problem. Leaders like German Chancellor Schmidt told me: Look, Torrijos, for me and for Germany, but especially for me, the problem of the canal is not just a matter of free, innocent passage for our tonnage; it is as much a sentimental matter for me as it is for you. I was raised in Hamburg, one of Germany's main ports, and even as a child, ever since I could move around the wharves, I saw ships which were coming from or going to Panama.

So that name has a sentimental meaning for me, as it does for your people. I congratulate you. Do not feel alone and never believe that this treaty will not be ratified. I say that it cannot fail to be ratified because it is a problem of such significance to world shipping that it is not possible to commit the irresponsible act of refusing to ratify it for your people. And it is such an important matter, other leaders told me, that it would be disastrous for world trade if the intransigence of those who do not understand the true importance of this should be allowed to endanger the innocent passage of ships of all the world's flags that transit the canal.

I return with great optimism. I am very optimistic because I had felt that the problem was local. The problem has an umbrella, a universe that is much larger than we thought, and the support of these men is much more extensive than I expected.

On returning from Europe, I had a meeting with President Carter, a meeting which was much commented upon in this country, and justly so because, as a result of a standing operating procedure in history the booby traps always come at the end. It is always at the end that the Panamanian people are asked to sign receipts for intervention, to sign receipts which are degrading, or to sign receipts which disguise the perpetual presence of a foreign power in our territory. There were those who advised me: Omar, do not go. Do not go because those people are very smart, very clever, very smart and very clever and they make you unknowingly sign something that could reverse all that we have won. I went. I paid no attention to this advice. I paid no attention to this advice, first of all, because I divine, I discover, I visualize, and I see in Carter—when I talk with Carter I realize that I am talking of a man who has turned his back on intervention, that I am facing a man of high moral character. We met, and what he proposed was quite acceptable for my signature, but I did not wish to sign it precisely because I represent 1.7 million inhabitants and I did not wish there to be the slightest doubt regarding my actions. And I did not wish anyone to believe that, by deceit, flattery or attention, I could be made to accept something which our people do not accept.

However, those who think this way—this way of thinking is the product of the exaggerated foreign presence in the Canal Zone, because to think this way is to underestimate or underrate the ability of the Panamanians.

Listen, I regard myself just as smart as those people, and those people are so smart they can detect a lame man even if he is sitting. [laughter] They can detect a lame man even if he is sitting, those people are so smart. Nevertheless, I talked to him and he told me the following very respectfully. He speaks quite a bit of Spanish and if one talks to him slowly he understands. There they use the term a four-eye meeting, a six-eye meeting, and eight-eye meeting because the interpreter's eyes are innocent eyes, they do not count. We held a four-eye meeting with the interpreter. And he said to me: Torrijos, we have made a commitment. We made a commitment and signed it. The commitment was that we would sell the same product on different markets. I said, that is correct. [Then he added] but it turns out we are not selling the same product. When Romulo—they know Romulo's name, he handles it very well—when Romulo says that we go indiscriminately anywhere we please and when Linowitz says that, regardless of any pact or signature, we [always] follow our national interests, both of them are hurting us because that was not the intention of what we signed.

Tell your people, but please tell them that neither the United States nor this government has any interest in intervening in the peaceful existence of that nation. And I said: Would you affirm this, Mr. President. [He answered] I affirm this to you as many times as you want. We have no interest in intervening in your internal, intimate or domestic life, in your political form or in the way of being of the Panamanians. But tell them also that in case the canal is attacked or threatened, or if the free circulation or transit of 15,000 ships per year now, 26,000 in 2000, is endangered, we do want to have the right to support that people so that their principal natural resource is not blocked.

When I told him: Well, that is the way I see it, too. I feel you are obliged—obliged—to come and defend us if our military or defense capacity is insufficient compared with the attacking force.

He said: Well, that is where the difference lies. You say obliged, but here I have to sell this as having the right to do so. We feel the same, we are saying the same thing.

So we drafted a declaration. We drafted one in the United States and we drafted one here. It is a declaration which guarantees and explains. It explains because he was elected in a country of 200,000 [as heard] inhabitants who felt a certain moral loathing because their fatherland, the United States, had turned into the world's international policeman, because they have young people on their way back from interventions, because it is a youth which feels moral loathing and repugnance for what happened in Santo Domingo, for what happened in Vietnam and for what happened in Playa Giron. It is a youth [he corrects himself] it is a country on its way back from such interventions and he did not want for a single moment . . . he said: Explain this to them well, but explain it to them in the way I am explaining it to you. I do not want the Panamanian people to think for a single moment that I am disguising here a receipt to intervene in their peaceful existence or way of life. That is signable and I [Torrijos] believe I should have signed it, but I did not do so to avoid misinterpretations.

We then parted. Both of us felt very happy. He told me: Have faith, have faith because moral causes always prevail. Your cause is moral and so is my attitude in listening to a moral attitude. I know I am capable of convincing my people that they have been taught a distorted story and that, as a result of this, many of them have come to feel that Panama exists under the same moral or geographical condition as Alaska or Louisiana, but that is my problem and I can assure you that I can resolve that problem.

When I asked him what were the possibilities that the treaty would be rejected, he answered: Do not think negatively, Torrijos, do not think negatively. The only thing is that I do not want you to pressure me or tell me to sign it Monday, Tuesday, or tomorrow. Give me some time and this treaty will be signed.

I told him, a treaty awaiting to be ratified represents hope, but a rejected treaty is a provocation. And he said, that is right, that is the way I see it, too.

On arriving here and as a good observer of my people—I feel that I am a man who understands your feeling, who understands my people's intimate truth, because there are two types of truths, public truths and intimate truth, and I understand intimate truth, that truth which you will express in the plebiscite. I understand it and I come pretty close to understanding almost perfectly—I realized that the issue was being viewed differently here.

Instead of talking about the real present, they were talking about the legal future. What does the real present mean?

The real present means that there is an enclave there, that bases have to be built and that those military bases have teeth, claws, cannons and a large capacity for retaliation. That is the real present. The real present means that because the country is divided by that enclave we have not been able to perfect our independence and place our flag there, the visible symbol of our sovereignty. The real symbol of our sovereignty is the right of every Panamanian to attend a school or hold a job, the right of every Panamanian mother not to be abandoned to her own resources, and her right to have the state provide herewith a job and her child with an education. That is the real present. We often forget this.

The new treaty—although I never like to mix the economic aspects with the issue of sovereignty, I must also admit that sovereignty means not being dependent; that sovereignty means having a job, that sovereignty means to continue providing our school age children with decent classrooms. I must admit that in this aspect we have not been sovereign. We have not been fulfilling certain sacred principles of sovereignty, and one can easily make a mistake and confuse pseudonationalistic feelings with real nationalistic feelings. In this we have had many pseudonationalistic factors. Let us look at things as nationalists. As nationalists we see that thousands are jobless; as nationalists we see that Colon is demanding and awaiting a response; as nationalists we see that farmers want the Canal Zone market incorporated into their sales market whenever there is superproduction. That is being nationalistic. There we see a part, an important aspect, of real sovereignty. Panamanian farmers want the Canal Zone incorporated into their market because at present there is such contempt * * * the 1903 treaty is so bad that under it [Americans in the Canal Zone] are authorized to bring in tomatoes from California.[laughter].

Those are tomatoes from California that are brought here on ships and when they arrive here how could they taste like a Los Santo tomato? They do not. However, there are some people who despise our people so much that they prefer to eat a tasteless and colorless tomato rather than a tomato produced in the hills of Volcan, or Boquete, or in the warm lands of Herrera, Los Santo and Nata. These are things we have to explain to you, and we have to explain them to you because these are things which form part of the dismantling and gradual turnover that the treaty establishes, that the treaty authorizes, we will replace milk from the Netherlands with milk from Panama and Australian meat with Panamanian meat. All these things will solve the situation of thousands and thousands of jobless persons in our country.

So, instead of thinking about those great elegant legal theories, let us think about the real future of our fatherland. Do not think that in the year 2001 there will be a ruler who will be the reincarnation of Theodore Roosevelt. No, gentlemen, the course of history is as irreversible as the course of a river. No one can tell a river to return to the mountains. Rivers flow to the sea because this is their natural and historic path. The course of history cannot be stopped. Those who think that history can be stopped, those having these legal shortcircuits are not aware of the reality of our people. They are not thinking about the reality of our people, because we have a different situation. Our people are a nation that feels, that thinks and that is urging me to solve their needs. Sovereignty is part of life. It can be touched, but it cannot be eaten. Sovereignty is also an obligation on the part of the government to give all Panamanians a decent job, to give all Panamanian children a health program that will begin to take care of them before they are born and continue taking care of them until they die. This is sovereignty. This is the real present. This is real sovereignty.

It is also being said that the treaty should not be approved because we are going to misuse the annuity of 80 million [balboas]. I do not know why. 80 million will not hurt. We need it. These people are claiming 80 million for their development. 80 million can be used to create 40,000 jobs, each paying 200 balboas. So what do they want? For us to keep 2 million? I do not understand.

There is something of which we must be aware: There are Panamanians who are not thinking only of occupying the zone, but of occupying it to plunder it. They are mistaken. Those who think that filth will replace cleanliness, that anarchy will replace order, and that disrespect will take the place of respect, those who are working so that there will not be free and innocent transit for all the nations of the world are working from the position of those who do not want us to administer the canal. They are working together.

I have just returned from a trip around the world. The world has much faith and knows a great deal about Panama. The leaders do. They trust that Panama has the capacity to manage the canal with common sense.

Somebody told me: Torrijos, you have shown great political maturity. Your presence here is evidence of the great political maturity of your people. Your people have accepted a negotiated solution. Probably I will not be alive in the year 2000 to see it, but this, one of those leaders told me is the greatest altruistic action a ruler can perform.

When I told this same thing to another leader, he told me: What do you mean? What is this about you not being around in the year 2000? You are still young. In the year 2000 I will be 70 or 71 years old, if I do not hide the years and if I keep continuing. He said: You will still be strong at that time. I said: No. Statistics say that the average lifespan in our country is 64 years. He then asked: Do you believe in statistics? And I said: Yes, I believe in my country's statistics because they are accurate.

However, there is need for mixing the credo with punishment. As somebody once said you should mix the credo with rocks and faith with the whip. [sentence as heard] Those thinking about entering the zone to plunder * * * and I am talking about all Panamanians—including myself—we are going to leave Gamboa prison open in order to lock them up right there, so that they may taste it. We are going to let them try out the jail there so that they can correctly use the jail if they try to use the Canal Zone incorrectly.

The treaty states that there will be loans of up to 50 million balboas for the National Guard. This scares even me, but what the people do not know is that a study by the staff has made three recommendations: First, this 50 million must not be used to increase the National Guard's capacity for reprisal, movement or firepower. Second recommendation: If we want to continue having, or make possible, peaceful coexistence among our people, the National Guard should never have a percentage greater than 50 percent of the number of teachers in the country. That is, the National Guard can only be half as large as the total number of teachers in the country. This means that if we have 30,000 teachers, there can be a maximum of 15,000 guards. But if there are 100,000 teachers, we will not have 50,000 guards because that would be too many.

The third recommendation is that in the Canal Zone the policing of the installations can be perfectly carried out with only an additional 300 guards. However, the staff recommends that, although 300 guards are sufficient, we should have 500 in order to further distribute jobs.

However, these 500 guards must be high school graduates and bilingual, and they must have no military training, but detective training and training in criminal investigation for crimes that could occur around a canal, and training in the problems that result from the movement of 15,000 ships a year. However, they also recommend that these Panamanian graduates include men and women—because there is much discrimination against women in this country. We will see to it that the new system will not discriminate much against women. Women can direct traffic perfectly well. We will give these 500 graduates the opportunity to work and to study in order not to cut short their careers so they can go on to the university.

When we think about obtaining that 50 million in 10 years, I am in fact thinking about a war, but about the war we have now, a war whose mission it is to have helicopters and planes not for combat but for transportation to take a medical team at any time to any part of the country; that is, we are thinking about a structure that would correspond to that kind of war and that type of mission.

When we think about equipping the National Guard we are not thinking about tanks. We are thinking about attack tractors, tractors to attack the land, about cranes and machinery with which to attack and punish, to punish the river which has killed so many children on their way to school, to punish it with a bridge. This is the type of war we think about, to develop a National Guard with a strong civic action at the service of the people. We do not need too many rifles. We only require the number necessary to guarantee peaceful coexistence and we do not believe that we are—and never want to be—a repressive government. We are not thinking about flamethrowers, but about guns that spread seed killer. We are not thinking about destructive war machinery, but we are thinking about machinery to destroy ignorance, machinery that will promote development.

Are we in a hurry to sign the treaty for economic reasons? What reason would we have to hurry? The economic problems do exist. I will not deny this. The money we have spent and owe has been invested. You have seen it. The country has progressed a lot in 9 years and it could have progressed more, it could have progressed more. We are aware of this. We now have a country and government that are well equipped, well organized, a government that not only has ideas but has turned the ideas into projects and the projects will be turned into work.

We have been negotiating for 13 years. There has been no hurry. Nine of those 13 years correspond to our government. Understand me well, I want this nation to continue having confidence in me. No one makes me sign anything under pressure. I would prefer to disappear from the world of the living rather than permit the humiliation of my people with my signature. I am not looking for that. There has been no pressure of any kind. What has happened is that a series of circumstances arose in which the correlation of force was a correlation of moral forces, because a President Carter emerged who is ashamed to apply force to a weak country, who feels shame and listens to his country youth who do not want to return to the battlefields of Vietnam, because there was understanding and because I also matured a lot politically. Previously I was very intransigent. I wanted the gringos to leave on Monday. However, a negotiation is a compromise. It is not a cosmetic document, it is not a precious document, but it is a working instrument. Note that working instruments are designed to be effective, not to be pretty. I am satisfied with this instrument we have designed because this instrument guarantees that gradually the enclave will disappear and guarantees that more than 1,000 square kilometers will be incorporated in 3 years; that is, 30 full moons, 3 sugar harvests, 3 holy weeks—in 3 years all these square kilometers are incorporated into the geography of national dignity.

What do I mean by that? I mean that the police disappear immediately and our police, who could be the son of Nino, the son of (Pincho) or whoever, go in. However, the Panamanian policeman will be paid better because his responsibility will be much greater since he will be protecting vital installations and since we must set an example of guaranteeing with our responsibility the support that the world has given us. We must keep order and these policemen will have to be well prepared and specialized. We have National Guardsmen, many National Guardsmen with a high degree of professionalism and who speak English. However, they must speak one, two or three languages, at least.

Therefore, there has been no hurry. That has not been the ingredient. The ingredient has been those who gave me their support, all those who gave me their support, because this very local cause was first converted by us into a national cause, then into a hemispheric cause and finally we turned it into a world cause and we have to act with responsibility in reply to the support that the world has given us.

(Question) I would like to make an observation. You have made a general presentation of the prospects for our development, not only economic but also political and administrative and governmental, assuming that the treaties become effective. Since you have just returned from Washington and spoke to President Carter, you are bringing back the experience and situation of Washington. I would like to ask you, what would happen or what would be the reaction of your government or the Panamanian people if the United States were to reject the treaties?

(Answer) First of all, I returned very convinced, not only due to Carter's opinion, but due to the opinion of the world's leaders who told me that this problem is not yours alone, but it is also our problem. We see the canal in a worldwide frame of reference, not in a local one. This problem goes far beyond the country or the electoral district of a senator. Nevertheless, in asking President Tito this question [words indistinct] he said don't worry man, how could they not approve this. It would be such an irresponsible act that it is inconceivable in this day and age of history to commit such an irresponsible act.

Nevertheless, let us be pessimistic. Let us assume that it will not be approved in spite of the pressure—not pressure of force but pressure to convince—which all the leaders of the world will exercise in support of Carter. All these things could happen, (I asked him the same question you asked). He said: Well, undoubtedly I completely agree with you that when all the paths for a peaceful solution are closed to a nation, it is completely justified to undertake a violent path. However, Torrijos, that does not justify that if it is rejected today you will take the violent path on Monday. You have to convince all the leaders of the world that you are right. You have to convince all the world's leaders that you are right and that it is the Senate's intransigence that endangers free transit, not you with a guerrilla movement or a unilateral decision. If you do not convince them, they will blame you and they will say that with your intransigence, by feeling and thinking, you have affected free transit, you have converted the transit of 8 hours into a transit of 30 days. Therefore, it is up to you to take a plane and go to talk to all the heads of state of the world. This could take you almost a year. You must convince them so that whenever this people must take another course because all the peaceful routes have been closed to it, it will have 150 spokesmen in the world and we will have not only moral support but even material support. I say 150 because this is the number of countries existing in the world.

(Question) General Torrijos, there is another matter which has been in the news during this period of intense debate in the country.

It refers to the possibility of building a sea-level canal. The opponents of the treaty claim that, by means of the treaty, Panama is mortgaging its future and granting the United States a series of rights for the building of a sea-level canal at its discretion. I would like you, General, in this talk with the Panamanian people, to explain to us really what is the nature of the agreement existing in the treaties regarding the possibility of building a sea-level canal.

(Answer) This is correct. If there was not so much suspicion—but I see it not as suspicion about me because the people know me, but it is traditional distrust because the people always look for the bad parts—if it were not for this suspicion we would be working already with the United States on the updating and adaptation of the studies for a sea-level canal. However, since this is not a matter in dispute, nor must it be solved in the treaty, I have not wanted to bring it up or accept that it be brought because if we accept this it could mean that attention will be sidetracked to the sea-level canal and the U.S. reactionary forces could say: Let us leave the situation as it is and wait for the sea-level canal.

However, there is a great deal of interest in the United States. In the treaty we give priority, not exclusiveness, for the building of a sea-level canal. The United States is given the first option. We commit ourselves to jointly study what the construction methods and route shall be, keeping in mind that it will use conventional means—that is, the atomic bomb cannot be used in building the sea-level canal.

The senator from Alaska is the one most interested in this sea-level canal because Alaska has become a great source of petroleum with possibilities that go far beyond the petroleum produced in the continental U.S. territory. The Alaska senator said: Omar, if you sign this letter I can get from the Senate 7 million balboas so that jointly with you—when I say you I am thinking about who I am going to appoint, I am thinking of the Polytechnical Institute, I am thinking of the best trained Panamanian minds in ecology, in engineering, in canal problems—let us begin to make this study now. This study should cost 7 million: 3 million for ecology, 3 million for engineering and another for something else.

I brought this matter up because some may say: He has not solved the treaty problems as yet and he is getting involved in another problem. I do not want our people to think—and our people know this—that a second marriage is the triumph of hope over experience.

(Question) General, if you have no objection, there is a matter to which I would like to return. It deals with the economic aspects of the treaty, especially the prospects of economic development in the country by means of the use of the annuity. My insistence is based on the fact that in general the country is confronting a series of economic problems, and economic factors are very important. I understand that the people are very interested in knowing how the return of the canal will reflect on the well-being of their families.

(Answer) This is a fact. This is what I say: It means the sovereignty of the Panamanian, the sovereignty of the moment, the true sovereignty. The treaty brings many economic benefits. From $2 million it passes to $80 million. There are aid plans. They are not gifts. I am very distrustful and do not accept generosity or gifts of any kind. He who accepts a gift runs the risk of being deprived of it later. The treaty includes loans which will almost allow us to solve the housing problem in the country. I feel that I have been foiled when after 9 years I have not been able to solve the problem of giving every Panamanian family a roof over their heads.

This economic injection—it is not a gift, but it is like collecting an earned salary—brings with it loans for the Agricultural Development Bank which has so much influence in our agriculture. It brings loans for irrigation and it returns the docks and drydocks. When I was in Sweden I contracted with a Swedish concern for the greatest utilization of the drydocks which are now not being used. They are among the installations to be returned. It also has the economic advantage that we can, in an organized, orderly and planned manner, build housing projects that are not as far away as Cerro Batea and the Chagres, which is detrimental to the family economy because what they save in housing they will spend on transportation. They are too far from the marketing and working centers. It also means that every North American who retires must be replaced by a Panamanian. It sees a prosperous economic horizon and I also see that there is the hope of solving our problems. It is a real hope, not a false one. It is a positive and not a fictitious hope. I see this people having the basic things which every government must provide.

(Question) General, as in the case of the economic aspect about which I feel very pleased because of the new concept and emphasis you have given this matter, I want to bring up the matter of neutrality because during these 6 weeks of debate it has been the central point of debate and it seems that the neutrality pact, the treaty dealing with permanent neutrality and the canal's operation, has become the Achilles heel of these documents. I would like for you, tonight in this talk with the Panamanian people, to explain more thoroughly how we should understand neutrality, what it represents for our country, what degree of mortgage, if any, it represents for our sovereignty and how it affects our development as an independent nation.

(Answer) This is correct. What does neutrality mean? It means that Panama commits itself to the free transit of all ships of all flags of the world, without charging one more than the other. It means that Panama takes on the obligation of maintaining the geographic basin at the service of this shipping, because the canal can be very well defended, but if we did not keep the geographic basin at the service of this shipping, navigation would be impossible because there would be no water. And no matter how good a sailor the captain of a ship may be, he cannot navigate without water. It means that Panamanians, no matter how much we may fight internally, must respect the fact that this strategic belt is at the service of humanity, and that this strategic belt is our main natural resource, which has to bear the burden of the development of future generations.

What happens, then? There are those who allege that this must be weighted against what can happen in 23 years, that what we have signed is a receipt for intervention. This is not true, I would be irresponsible if I were to sign a receipt that permits intervention in Panama, but I would be equally irresponsible if I failed to leave future generations the certainty that, if their country is attacked by forces which are superior to our capacity to respond, the United States is obligated to come to our defense.

I do not want the money, the assets, the economic benefits generated by the canal to be spent totally for weapons. It would be irresponsible to spend it all on weapons because all the weapons we could buy would be useless against the weapons which other countries have. I do not want The Netherlands to say in the future that they have the right—and there is a basis—to intervene in Panama. Those who wish to intervene always find a basis to do so: that is, tomorrow the Nordic countries could say: The first people to arrive in Panama were the Vikings, and we have the right to that strategic waterway. Spain could say: Columbus was there, so it belongs to us. Others near here, because we looked at them with disapproval, could say: You have disrespect for our flag and we are going to intervene there.

I do not want the security and tranquility of future generations to be dependent on the number of tanks that another country may have. We will maintain the force necessary to insure peaceful coexistence, but if we are attacked by superior forces, the United States is obligated to come to our defense. And when I said that we remain under protective umbrella, I say it without shame. I feel no shame because I do not wish to escape the threat of a lizard only to be threatened by a shark. This is the way it is. I do not wish to escape the threat of one kind of snake only to be threatened by another kind of snake. No, sir! What I want is for this to be really neutral and for the whole world to respect the isthmus as a peaceful place where all flags are welcome and which has opened its depth, for the benefit of humanity.

However, since at times this respect . . . it is necessary for the United States to be committed so that when we ring the bell here, when we push the button, a bell rings over there, and the United States comes in defense of the Panama Canal.

(Question) General, certain comments have been made regarding the influence to which the National Guard could be subjected because of the mechanism of joint defense provided in the treaty for the next 23 years, an influence which, of course, would be exerted by the United States, by the U.S. troops. Some critics of the treaty call this the Americanization of the National Guard. As chief of government, and also as commander in chief of the National Guard, what do you have to say about this?

(Answer) The people think that joint defense means being in the same barracks, that we are going to send all our combat troops, our guards, the Tigres, the Diablos Rojos, the Massemontes [National Guard units], all the companies to the Canal Zone. This is not so. They are going to remain at their posts. In the event of an attack on the Canal Zone, the troops which are in Chiriqui, the troops in Tinajita, the troops which are here, come from their duty stations, and if the attack is superior to our capacity for response, I repeat, we push the button, the bell rings, and the United States is obligated to come to our defense. On the other hand, when one says Americanization, it seems as if they are disrespecting our nature. Why do they not think—if our guards were really going to be there—that perhaps we would Panamanianize the Gringo soldiers?

There is one thing that I wish to be very clear, that is that every one will remain at this post, and that guard duty will be carried out by 500, 600 or 400 guards, whether men or women, who are specialized in police surveillance of the canal. This is so because we have to maintain standards of respect which are somewhat higher than usual, but without repressing anyone. When the guardsman, the policeman, the policewoman, the traffic officer is a compatriot, he can reprimand one for a violation, cite one for a violation, but not oppress, which is what is happening at present. They (the U.S. forces) do not reprimand; they repress and oppress.

(Question) General, you were out of Panama for almost 3 weeks. You returned 1 week ago, and, of course, you have rapidly been able to sound out the level of the debate which will culminate in the plebiscite on Sunday. What comments, what message, do you have for the Panamanian people with regard to the plebiscite on Sunday?

(Answer) Mario, here is a document which it might be appropriate to read now, or else I will read it later, so that the people can see—there is talk about what Torrijos signed.

(Question) Let us read it now.

(Answer) Here President Carter commits himself, and he confirmed what he said.

(I said:) Look, Mr. President, you are not going to intervene in our domestic affairs, [and he said]: I told you that this is not my intention. Read it, read the document, so that people do not think that I went around signing things, that I hid this or that. Let the people know that when they go to vote on 23 October, everything will have been said. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, hidden.

(Velasquez) Very well, General, with pleasure. It concerns the joint Carter-Torrijos declaration agreed upon in Washington on Friday, which states as follows: In accordance with the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and the functioning of the Panama Canal—the neutrality treaty—Panama and the United States have the responsibility of insuring that the canal will remain secure and open to the ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries in accordance with its respective constitutional procedures, will defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and will consequently have the right to act in the event of an aggression or threat to the canal or the peaceful transit of ships through the canal. It does not mean, nor will it be interpreted to mean, that the United States has the right to intervene in Panama's internal affairs. Any action by the United States will be designed to insure that the canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and will never be directed against the territorial integrity or the political independence of Panama. The neutrality treaty provides that warships and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will have the right to transit the canal expeditiously. This was the intention, and it will be so interpreted, of guaranteeing the passage of these ships through the canal as rapidly as possible, without obstacles, with simplified processing and, in the case of necessity or emergency, they may go to the head of the line of ships in order to transit the canal quickly. This is the end of the quote from the joint declaration.

(Torrijos) This is what we all want. There was a problem about whether they would go first. All warships will be first in line. I do not wish to see warships around here. Those warships have guns which point everywhere. They point everywhere, and when warships are in line, I would prefer to let a ship carrying copper wait rather than delay a ship which has such destructive power, because if that ship is attacked near here because it did not transit quickly, it (?harms) the country. So let it leave quickly, let it leave quickly. This is the interpretation. And I would sign this right here if you want. If Carter asks, I would sign this because this is what our youth, our generations want. And this is the peace which I am going to take to my grave—that I do not leave a canal which is greatly coveted by the whole world without knowing that a great power is obligated to come to its defense.

Finally, in closing, I would like to ask our people, now that we are incorporating the entire country under a single flag and now that our cause is only a few days from an overwhelming triumph, I would not like to see a country united under one flag, with a single geography, but with the Panamanian family divided. I ask you not to promote hatred. Let us not encourage bad blood. If in the heat of discussion—it had to be heated since it is such a hot topic—I have offended anyone, I sincerely ask them to forgive me. I do not want to leave a country united under one flag but with a divided Panamanian family. Thank you very much.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senate debate regarding the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties will begin shortly. Like so many of my colleagues, I have spent the months since the treaties were signed carefully examining the issues raised by them. As part of this examination, I wrote to Secretary of State Cyrus Vance requesting the administration's position on what appear to me to be the major questions raised by the treaties. On December 5, 1977, I received a very detailed response to my letter.

As we embark on this debate, I think it important that my colleagues have the benefit of this exchange. Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter and the administration's response be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NOVEMBER 3, 1977.

HON. CYRUS R. VANCE,

Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing in reference to the proposed Panama Canal Treaties.

I have examined with great interest the testimony you and other Administration officials gave to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee regarding these treaties. This testimony, together with that given by opponents of the treaties, has been very helpful in clarifying the issues. The major questions have been delineated.

I attach a list of what I think, from my perspective as a Maryland Senator, are the major questions regarding these treaties. I would appreciate having the Administration's views on these questions. I intend to share both my questions and your responses with my constituents.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.,
U.S. Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
Washington, D.C., December 5, 1977.

Hon. CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, Jr.
U.S. Senate

DEAR SENATOR MATHIAS: Secretary Vance has asked me to reply to your letter of November 23 concerning the Panama Canal Treaties.

I am enclosing a response to the specific questions you raised and some related materials. We are happy to have been able to respond to your inquiry and hope the attached information will be helpful.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS J. BENNETT, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

1. Sovereignty—Is the Panama Canal Zone part of the United States as has been suggested by some people? What “right” do we presently have to the Panama Canal?

The enclosed statement entitled “Panama Canal Treaty Negotiations—Legal Status of the Canal Zone” describes our treaty rights in Panama. In brief, we have authority as if sovereign in the Canal Zone. We have never had sovereignty, which remains with Panama.

As a result of our treaty rights, the United States controls a strip of territory ten miles wide, coast to coast. It exercises exclusive jurisdiction over 550 square miles. Within this area we operate not only the Canal but a government on Panamanian soil. The Canal Zone Government maintains a police force, courts, and jails to enforce U.S. laws, which apply equally to all persons, including Panamanians. We maintain seven military areas. For all these rights we pay Panama an annuity of $2.3 million.

The status of the Canal Zone is different from that of territory over which the United States has sovereignty such as Alaska or the areas included in the Louisiana Purchase. In the treaty for the Louisiana Purchase the United States was explicitly granted full sovereignty over the “territory with all its rights and appurtenances.” The purchase of Alaska involved a similar cession of territory. In neither transaction was provision made—as in the 1903 Treaty with Panama—for a continuing annual payment or for a continuing relationship on the matters covered by the agreements.

2. Cost of Benefits to U.S.—How much money has the United States invested in the Panama Canal since 1903, and what benefits have we derived from this investment?

Partly because accounting procedures for the Canal enterprise during its history have varied, there has been uncertainty over what would be an appropriate figure for the total United States investment in the Canal. In an effort to clarify this matter, we have asked the Treasury to review total United States expenditures on and receipts from the Canal since its inception. The final figures are not yet available, but a preliminary calculation indicates that over the entire period since 1903 expenditures have exceeded receipts by $130 million. We expect to have a definitive figure shortly and will forward it to you together with explanatory material.

The benefits of the Canal to the United States are in the time and money it saves our vessels when they move between the Atlantic and Pacific. That is why we built it, and that is why we continue to care about its future. We have operated the Canal more as a public service than as a business. The Canal's tolls have been set as low as has been compatible with meeting costs. As a result, shipping of all nations, not just our own trade, has benefited from the waterway.

3. Future Costs—Besides the many physical assets of the Canal Zone, what other economic benefits would Panama receive under the Treaty and at what cost to the American taxpayer and consumer?

An enclosed fact sheet outlines the payments Panama will receive under the new Canal agreement. We believe these payments represent a reasonable economic settlement and one which is in the interest of the United States. The annuity payments (first paragraph of the fact sheet) are to be drawn entirely from canal revenues and thus do not require the use of United States tax revenues. The public service payment (second paragraph of the fact sheet) reimburses Panama for services to be provided to the Panama Canal Commission. These services are presently provided by the Canal Zone Government at a cost of $18 million annually—or $8 million more than we will be paying Panama for these services at the start of the new treaty. The loans, guarantees, and credits contained in the economic cooperation program (third paragraph of the fact sheet) are within existing authorized programs. The only appropriation required will be $50 million to a reserve fund for the Foreign Military Sales credits. Thus, the cooperation program will for the most part impose no additional burdens on the taxpayer.

4. Commercial Value—What are United States commercial interests in the Canal? How will United States commerce be affected by the expected increases in toll rates?

Roughly 70 percent by tonnage of the cargo passing through the Canal is either going to or coming from United States ports; however, this cargo amounts to only about 12 percent of total United States waterborne trade by tonnage and is an even smaller portion of our total foreign trade.

As noted in our answer to Question 3, the Canal Treaties will provide increased payments to Panama from Canal revenues. They will also entail a number of changes in the Canal administration that will increase some operating costs and decrease others. The net effect of these changes on Canal operating costs will, we estimate, require that toll rates be increased about 30 percent when the treaties go into effect in order that the Canal can continue—as at present—to be financially self-sufficient. On the basis of studies that have been made, we do not anticipate that a 30 percent toll increase will be a burden to world shipping or the American consumer. In this connection, it is of interest to note that toll were increased 50 percent between 1974 and 1976 and that the overall economic effect of these increases in the United States was small.

5. Port of Baltimore—The expected toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent resulting from the treaties should not affect the volume of traffic to and from the port of Baltimore. About 20 percent of all cargo handled in Baltimore transits the Canal—24 percent of all general cargo. In most cases, a 30 percent toll increase would not cause diversion to alternative routes or commodities. Where this might result, the cargo would continue to be handled at the port in spite of a different route.

For example, the bulk of this trade is destined for the Far East. If the tolls were to rise substantially, traffic might be diverted around the Cape of Good Hope or through the Suez Canal. This is already the case with an increasing amount of Appalachian coal destined for the Orient. From either Norfolk or Baltimore, it is shipped around the Cape of Good Hope on ships of up to 125,000 tons at a cost that is comparable to the shipping of coal through the canal on smaller ships, and any increase in Panama Canal tolls would accelerate this trend. But, by either route, the volume of coal leaving the port of Baltimore is unaffected. Therefore, even if the toll increase resulting from the treaty changes transportation routing from the East to the Orient, the Port of Baltimore would continue to handle the traffic.

In the case of Baltimore's trade with the west coast of Latin America, the traffic would not be diverted by a toll increase and therefore the Port of Baltimore would not be adversely affected. General cargo is the largest category of trade originating from the port destined for Latin America. Our sensitivity studies show that a 30 percent increase would have a minimal impact on the average additional transport cost (for example, approximately $3.00 on a new automobile). This is not enough of an increase to cause diversion to alternative routes.

6. Canal Operation—Once the United States has departed, what evidence is there that the Canal would continue to be efficiently operated?

More than 70 percent of the work force is Panamanian. The Treaty provides for training programs and on-the-job experience for Panamanians at all levels of the operation during the period of United States control. We believe that this period of twenty years provides ample time to prepare Panamanian personnel to operate the Canal.

By the time the treaty expires, there should be well-qualified Panamanians to fill all the positions related to Canal operation.

7. Government of Panama—In dealing with a regime whose word and human rights record is suspect?

In general, Panamanian enjoy life, liberty and security of person. Secretary Vance stated in his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on September 26:

"The Panamanian Government has in the past been charged with abusing the civil and political rights of some of its citizens and we have discussed this issue with that Government. The closer relations between our two governments that will grow out of the new treaties will provide a more positive context in which to express such concerns, should it be necessary to do so in the future."

I am enclosing the full text of this statement and a copy of the Department's Human Rights Report which was part of the Congressional presentation document for the FY 1978 Security Assistance Program.

8. Strategic Significance—What is the strategic and diplomatic importance of the Canal? What will the strategic value be in the year 2000 when the last of our troops will be gone?

The position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has been that the Panama Canal is a major defense asset, the use of which enhances United States capability for timely reinforcement of United States forces. Its strategic military advantage lies in the economy and flexibility it provides to accelerate the shift of military forces and logistic support by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and to overseas areas. The strategic value of the canal is not expected to change substantially through the life of the new canal treaty and beyond. The United States military interest in the Canal, however, is in its use, not ownership. We need to be able to depend on the Canal when we need to move ships or cargo. This requires an arrangement that guarantees, as much as is possible, free passage at all times. It means making sure that:

The canal system is not physically put out of use by sabotage or by inept operation.

Ships passing through are safe from attack.

9. National Security Interests—On what basis does the Administration contend that the national security interests of the United States are best safeguarded by ratification?

While the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone can be defended, even in a hostile environment, the continuous operation of the Canal could not be ensured in that environment. The canal complex is susceptible to varying degrees of sabotage and the Canal Zone is vulnerable to attack from forces or weapons located outside the area of United States jurisdiction.

The political environment, therefore, is a very important factor in canal defense. The preferred defense of the Canal would be in conjunction with a friendly Panama. Thus a new Canal treaty, by fostering a friendly and cooperative relationship with Panama, would be most conducive to effective canal defense.

10. Risks of Non-ratification—What, if any, are the risks run by the United States if we don't ratify this Treaty?

It is fair to say that after 13 years of negotiating, if the treaties were rejected, our relations with Panama would be shattered, our standing in Latin America damaged significantly, and the security of the Canal itself placed in jeopardy.

11. Alternatives—What are the feasible alternatives to ratification of the Treaties?

a. No action.—

This option assumes that the status quo ante can be preserved. However, a decision not to press ahead with the treaty does not mean that the existing situation in Panama would continue indefinitely. Nationalists and extremist political forces in Panama are pressing for immediate and drastic changes in the Canal's status, and discontent in Panama will become stronger and more forceful if frustrated by the absence of a treaty.

b. Postponement.—

Postponement would satisfy neither those Panamanians who support the Treaty nor the Treaty's opponents, who want Panama to take possession of the Canal immediately. Thus, postponement would create an unstable situation, whose consequences would eventually be similar to those of taking no action.

SPECIFIC QUESTIONS

1. Article XII.—

For the duration of the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States and Panama are committed to deal exclusively with each other concerning the possible construction of any new canal. Paragraph I of Article XII states that both countries will conduct a joint feasibility study, and if the two countries conclude that a sea-level canal is necessary, will negotiate mutually acceptable terms and conditions for its construction.

Panama has agreed that no new canal will be built in its territory during the treaty period without the agreement of the United States, and in return, we have agreed not to negotiate for the right to construct an interoceanic canal elsewhere in the hemisphere.

We believe the agreement not to negotiate elsewhere is not detrimental to United States interests. On the contrary, this arrangement has assured us exclusive rights to participate in a sea-level canal along the only really suitable routes. The 1970 United States study of possible alternative routes for a sea-level canal concluded that from the standpoint of engineering feasibility and cost, sites in Panama are far more suitable for a sea-level canal than sites in any other country. For example, the estimated cost for constructing a canal with conventional explosives on the Nicaragua route was $11 billion, compared with $2 billion for a Canal in Panama.

2. Article XIII.—

While it is true that the Canal Company has been operating at a deficit for the last few years, we anticipate the Company will show a slight profit this year. Traffic is increasing, and with the advent of North Slope oil from Alaska, we expect this trend to accelerate.

In addition, under the terms of the new treaties, the Canal Zone Government will be dismantled and some of the Company's activities will revert to Panama. This will reduce expenditures and lower operating costs. We anticipate that a toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent will be necessary to meet our treaty obligations. It should be possible to hold toll increases at reasonable levels, although increases will, as in the past, be necessary from time to time to cover increases in operating costs due to inflation or other reasons.

Neutrality treaty

1. Article IV.

2. Article VI.—

There is no disagreement between the United States and Panama as to the meaning of Articles IV and VI. In October, both governments issued a statement of understanding which reaffirmed their interpretations of the meaning of these provisions. Enclosed is that statement and a paper on the Defense and Neutrality of the Panama Canal under the new treaties.

3. What legal weight does the understanding have?

Such statements are often made which are signed by neither party but represent their views. Our legal interpretation is that it is an agreed statement by both parties, and is the definitive interpretation of those two articles.

4. Consistency with Rio Pact, OAS and UN Charters.

The Neutrality Treaty is entirely consistent with this provision. It authorizes the use of force for the sole purpose of maintaining the neutrality of the Panama Canal. It does not authorize, and the United States would not consider the use of, armed force against the territorial integrity or independence of Panama or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of these Charters.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

I. Legal Status of the Canal Zone.—

The legal status of the Panama Canal Zone is a question of considerable interest in the context of current negotiations with Panama for a new canal treaty. The position of the United States Government concerning this matter is as follows:

Article II of the 1903 Treaty grants to the United States "the use, occupation and control" of the Canal Zone, and Article III authorizes the United States to exercise therein "all the rights, power and authority . . . which it would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory . . . to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

The question is often posed as to whether this grant of rights had the effect, under international law, of transferring the territory comprising the Canal Zone from Panamanian sovereignty to that of the United States. In other words, is the international legal status of the Canal Zone that of Panamanian or of United States territory?

It is clearly established under international law that a state may grant to a foreign state the right to exercise exclusive sovereign powers within portions of its territory without effecting a cession of its own sovereignty over that territory. For example, during the latter part of the 19th Century China's leases of naval bases to France, Germany and Russia included grants to the lessees of rights to exercise sovereign powers within the leased areas. (I MacMurray, Treaties and Agreements with and Concerning China, 1894—1919, at 112, 119, and 128.) Similarly, Article III of the U.S.-Cuba Agreement of February 16, 1903, relating to Guantanamo Naval Station provides:

"While on the one hand the United States recognizes the continuance of the ultimate sovereignty of the Republic of Cuba over the above described areas of land and water, on the other hand the Republic of Cuba consents that during the period of the occupation by the United States of said areas under the terms of this agreement the United States shall exercise complete jurisdiction and control over and within said areas * * *" (TS418; 6 Bevans 1113.)

A more recent example of one nation being granted sovereign rights within the territory of another is found in Article III of the Treaty of Peace with Japan (3 UST 3169; TIAS 2490) which authorized the United States to "exercise all and any powers of administration, legislation and jurisdiction over the territory and inhabitants of (the Ryukyu and Daito islands)" while Japan retained what Secretary Dulles termed "residual sovereignty"¹ over those areas. (The rights of the United States under Article III were terminated by the US-Japan Treaty of June 17, 1971).

With respect to the Canal Zone, the United States has consistently recognized that Panama retains "titular" sovereignty over the area.

"* * * The truth is that while we have all the attributes of sovereignty necessary in the construction, maintenance, and protection of the Canal, the very form in which these attributes are conferred in the treaty (of 1903) seems to preserve the titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the Republic of Panama . . . (Letter from Secretary of War William H. Taft to President Theodore Roosevelt, January 12, 1905.)

In essence, while the United States required extensive treaty rights to use the Canal Zone and to exercise sovereign powers within it, the area technically remains part of the territory of the Republic of Panama.

"The rights of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone offer an example of the most complete transfer of jurisdiction over a territory without its being a cession in the technical international law sense * * *" (Vali, Servitudes of International Law, 2d ed., 1958, 254.)

This distinction between the right to exercise jurisdiction within the Zone area and its international status was recognized in Article III of the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation of March 2, 1936 (53 Stat. 1807; TS 945), which refers to the Zone as "territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States."

Perhaps the most clear description of the nature of the rights the U.S. acquired in the 1903 treaty is that of M. Phillipe Bunau-Varilla, the principal drafter of the document:

"I decided to grant to the United States, in the interior of the zone, all rights, power, and authority that she would have if she were sovereign, to the entire exclusion of the use of any such rights, power and authority by the sovereign Republic of Panama.

The United States, without becoming the sovereign, received the exclusive use of the rights of sovereignty, while respecting the sovereignty itself of the Panama Republic." (Italics in original.) (Bunau-Varilla, From Panama to Verdun (1940 158).)

With respect to the domestic law of the United States, the Canal Zone has been treated in various ways for the purpose of defining the applicability to the Zone of specific legislative provisions. For example, the Canal Zone is considered to be an organized territory of the U.S. for purposes of extradition (37 Stat. 48 USC 1330). On the other hand, it is treated as foreign territory for purposes of customs duties (33 Stat. 843, 19 USC 126) and its ports are considered foreign ports for purposes of the transportation of mail (Luckenbach Steamship Co. v. U.S. 280 U.S. 173 (1930)).

Thus, U.S. domestic legislation and court decisions would not appear to provide a basis for any definitive conclusions with respect to the international status of the Canal Zone, nor are they intended to. Rather, such definitions are made for the sole purpose of extending the effect of a specific provision of U.S. law to the Canal Zone or of exempting the Zone from its application.

The often cited case of Wilson v. Shaw (204 U.S. 24 1907) must be considered in this context. That case was taken to the Supreme Court by a taxpayer who maintained that the Federal Government could not continue to expend funds lawfully for the Construction of an interoceanic ship canal in Panama. He sought an injunction against any further expenditures on the grounds that the U.S. did not have a sufficient legal interest in the Canal Zone to authorize the expenditure of tax money there. The Supreme Court held that the Federal Government did have broad enough power to encompass expenditure of funds for the construction of the Canal and refused to issue an injunction. In speaking of the legal interest of the U.S. in the Zone, the Court said,

"It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation, because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate."

Thus, the Supreme Court did equate the Canal Zone with territory belongings to the United States, but in the context of establishing the authority of the Federal Government to expend funds and to engage in construction work in the Zone. As noted above, the Court has subsequently held the Zone to be foreign territory for other purposes (Luckenbach Steamship Co. v. U.S. (280 U.S. 173 1930)), and such interpretations of the status of the Canal Zone under domestic U.S. law for the purpose of determining the applicability of specific statutes therein are not determinative as to its international status.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY—ECONOMIC ARRANGEMENTS FACT SHEET

1. Annuity Provisions (Article XIII).—

The new Panama Canal Commission shall pay Panama the following three annual payments exclusively out of Canal operating revenues:

a. 30 cents per Panama Canal ton transiting the canal. (This rate will be readjusted during biennial periods on the basis of the wholesale price index of total manufactured goods of the U.S. beginning 5 years after entry into force of the treaty.);

b. $10 million; and

c. Up to $10 million to the extent Canal operating revenues exceed expenditures.

2. Payments for Public Services (Article III).—

The new Panama Canal Commission and its U.S. citizen employees will be exempted from taxation by Panama. The Commission shall reimburse Panama $10 million for the cost of municipal public services; i.e., police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection. Every three years that cost will be reexamined to determine whether an adjustment of the payment should be made.

3. Economic Cooperation Outside the Treaty.—

Outside the treaty, the United States has pledged its best efforts commitment to provide Panama with an economic program to promote its economic stability and development under existing statutory programs. Each element of the program would provide non-concessional loans, credits or guarantees and would require private sector participation. The economic cooperation program over 5 years would include:

Up to $200 million in Export-Import Bank credits;

Up to $75 million in A.I.D. Housing Guarantees; and $20 million in Overseas Private Investment Corporation loan guarantees.

Panama will also receive up to $50 million in foreign military sales credits over a period of 10 years, under existing statutory programs, to improve Panama's ability in the Canal's defense.

HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

I. POLITICAL SITUATION

Panama is a republic governed under the provisions of a constitution which entered into force October 11, 1972. The present government came into power in 1968 following a coup. Organized opposition by political parties is not permitted. A transitory provision of the 1972 Constitution grants General Omar Torrijos broad powers as Chief of Government for a six-year period.

Torrijos has based his government on broad support within Panama, and has made a number of concessions to both the left and the right to assure the continuation of this support.

II. LEGAL SITUATION

The Constitution guarantees equality before the law. It guarantees a hearing before a competent authority within 24 hours of detention, and writ of habeas corpus. Warrants are required before a search can be undertaken. The Constitution also guarantees freedom of movement, religion, assembly and expression. These guarantees are generally observed.

Justice is generally administered fairly and without regard to race, social class or wealth.

III. OBSERVANCE OF INTERNATIONALLY RECOGNIZED HUMAN RIGHTS

A. Integrity of the person

Article 3: Panamanians enjoy the guarantee of life, liberty, and security of person. A very few exceptions have occurred where individuals engage in political activities which the Government considers inimical. Nearly all of the exceptions involving arbitrary imprisonment occurred prior to 1972. The noteworthy exceptions in recent years occurred when 14 participants in the January 1976 political protests and three persons who allegedly fomented riots in September 1976 were exiled.

Article 5: There is no evidence that the Panamanian Government makes a practice of arbitrary imprisonment, torture, or murder for political purposes. A "Panamanian Committee for Human Rights" has published an anonymously-authored pamphlet alleging brutality on the part of the Government. There is no independent corroboration of the allegations and it appears that nearly all of the alleged incidents are believed to have occurred during the 1968-71 period.

Article 8: In general, Panamanians can obtain an effective remedy from the courts if their rights are violated. Exceptions to this are more frequent for political opponents of the Government.

Article 9: The Government has exiled opponents who it felt threatened its existence. This occurred most recently in January and September 1976, when the government summarily exiled 17 prominent Panamanians. Although this latest group was composed primarily of lawyers and businessmen, opponents who have been exiled represent the full political spectrum including radicals on the left and leaders of the Communist party (PDP). Some exiled persons have been permitted to return to Panama after a time.

Article 10: The practice of amparo (habeas corpus), which requires that a hearing to determine charges and rights be held within twenty-four hours after arrest, is generally observed in Panama.

Article 11: Panamanians have reasonable assurance of obtaining a fair trial in the vast majority of civil and criminal cases. The guarantee of a fair trial might not be observed in a case with important political considerations, however.

B. Other important freedoms

The Government does not condone discrimination although some evidence of it remains in Panama's racially-mixed population. In general, Panamanians can move freely within the country and may travel abroad without restrictions. Property rights are respected.

There is freedom of religion. Freedom of assembly is observed. However, political organization and activity are limited. Organized open political opposition is not tolerated. The media are monitored by the government. While strict censorship is not imposed, editors and others in positions of responsibility are made aware of what will be tolerated by the government; and editors of one newspaper chain, which is owned primarily by high officials of the GOP, take guidance from the Government. While radio criticism of the GOP has occasionally been sharp, criticism appearing in the press is aimed primarily at low-level officials and at failures in the implementation of policies rather than broadside attacks on top leadership.

IV. OTHER HUMAN RIGHTS REPORTING

The Amnesty International Report on Torture, published in 1973, states that the most serious allegations of torture in Panama date from before 1970, but notes allegations of single instances in 1971 and 1972. The Amnesty International Report 1975-76 does not contain a section on Panama.

Freedom House describes Panama as "not free".

THE DEFENSE AND NEUTRALITY OF THE PANAMA CANAL UNDER THE NEW TREATIES

The new Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal provide the framework for the United States permanently to protect the security of the Panama Canal and to assure its operation in accordance with the general principle of transit by the vessels of all nations on a nondiscriminatory basis. The arrangements under which the United States will assure the security and neutrality of the Canal are in two forms: those which apply until 2000, while the United States operates, maintains and defends the Canal, and those which apply permanently thereafter.

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The arrangements in the Panama Canal Treaty for the protection and defense of the Canal until 2000 are based on the concept of a combined defense with Panama. However, under Article IV of the Treaty, the United States assumes primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal throughout the period of United States operation of it. Panama has agreed further in Article IV that the United States may act unilaterally against a threat to the Canal from any source.¹ While the United States has undertaken in Article IV to attempt to maintain its military force in Panama at a level no greater than that in the Canal Zone at the entry into force of the Treaty (at present approximately 9300), the United States may increase that force as it deems necessary for the defense of the Canal. In addition, the Treaty and its related agreements grant to the United States the rights until the year 2000 to use the specified defense sites and military installations necessary for the protection and defense of the Canal.

Article IV further provides for close coordination and cooperation between the United States Forces and the Panamanian National Guard. This will be carried out through the military Combined Board established in the Treaty. It is anticipated that during the Treaty term the Panamanian Forces will assume an increasing degree of operational responsibility in the combined plans the Combined Board will develop for Canal defense.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

Assurance of permanent access to the Canal for the United States after 1999 is provided by the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (Neutrality Treaty). This treaty enters into force simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty and does not terminate regardless of the termination of any other treaty or agreement between the two countries. The United States and Panama, during their respective periods as Canal operator, must operate the Canal in accordance with the regime of neutrality which is established in the Treaty. Thus, after 2000, Panama is obligated to the United States to afford access to the Canal to United States vessels, in accordance with these same provisions, including the right for its military vessels to transit the Canal at the head of the line of vessels waiting to transit when the United States considers it necessary. Panama will have the same obligation as regards any other canal constructed in Panama.

THE REGIME OF NEUTRALITY

The Treaty establishes a "regime of neutrality"—general rules for operation of the Canal and the transit of vessels—that are set out in the Treaty. The basic principle of this regime, stated in Article II of the Treaty, is that "both in time of peace and time of war the Canal will remain secure and open to peaceful transit by vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality without discrimination against any nation concerning conditions or charges of transit."

In addition to establishing the basic premise of non-discriminatory operation of the Canal, this statement sets forth two important general principles for the future. First, it makes clear that the security of the Canal is a vital element of its regime of neutrality. Secondly, it contains the basic commitment of both Parties to maintain the Canal open.

RULES OF NEUTRALITY

The regime of neutrality also contains specific standards for the operation of the Canal. These include commitments that it shall be operated efficiently and that the conditions of transit and the applicable rules and regulations shall be just, equitable, reasonable and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient operation of the Canal (Article III Section 1 (a)). There is a further requirement that tolls and other charges for transit and related services must be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law. (Article III Section 1(c)).

Special provision is made for the transit of military vessels without inspection, and irrespective of the type of armament they carry or how they are powered. (Article III Section 1(e)). Under this provision, military vessels which may be nuclear powered or armed are assured of the right to transit the Canal permanently without inspection. The Treaty permits such vessels to transit the Canal at all times, irrespective of any belligerent status they may have. However, the waters of the Canal would extend only for about three miles, as they do at present.² While a general blockade of the Canal outside these waters would not be permissible, belligerents of the United States navigating the high seas would be fair game.

One of the most significant elements of this regime of neutrality is Panama's commitment that after 1999 only Panama will operate this Canal or any other canal ever constructed in Panama (Article V and Article I). Panama has also agreed that it alone will maintain military forces or military installations within its territory after the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty (Article V).

Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty provides certain limited exceptions to the general principle of non-discriminatory transit established in Article II. The first exception is that U.S. and Panamanian military vessels may transit the Canal expeditiously regardless of "their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination, armament or cargo carried."

It is agreed that this special right of transit assures United States and Panamanian military vessels the quickest transit possible which will include, when necessary, the scheduling of their transit at the head of the line of vessels waiting to transit. The provision for expeditious passage is stated as an explicit exception but is not inconsistent with the general implementation of the principle of non-discrimination under the 1903 Convention in which certain vessels, e.g., passenger vessels and vessels carrying perishable cargos, may be scheduled ahead of waiting vessels when circumstances warrant.

The second exception to the general principle of non-discrimination is that the Canal operator is authorized to provide toll-free transit to the troops, vessels of war and materials of war of Colombia. This provision allows the United States, as Canal operator, to accord it such preferential transit in order to fulfill the United States' obligation to Colombia under the 1914 Thompson-Urrutia Treaty. After 1999 Panama is authorized to extend such preferential treatment to Costa Rica, its other neighboring country, as well.

The inclusion in the regime of neutrality of authorization for Panama to make this exception to the general principle of nondiscrimination for Costa Rica after 1999 highlights the fact that the Neutrality Treaty constitutes a permanent commitment from Panama to the United States to operate the Canal always in accordance with this regime; no changes in the regime could be made in the future unless the United States were to agree.

An important additional aspect of the Neutrality Treaty is its assurance in Article I that this "same regime of neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama." This means that the assurances of efficient operation and non-discriminatory access contained in the Treaty would continue in effect for any new Canal in Panama irrespective of when or by whom it may be constructed. (Under Article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States has a veto over any sea-level canal construction in Panama until the year 2000.)

MAINTENANCE OF THE REGIME OF NEUTRALITY

In Article IV of the Treaty, Panama and the United States agree to maintain permanently the regime of neutrality for this Canal and for any other canal which may ever be built in Panama with United States participation in construction or financing.³ Panama and the United States have issued a statement of interpretation clarifying the meaning of this Article. The statement recognizes that this Article commits both parties to defend the Canal permanently against any threat to the regime of neutrality established in the Treaty. Accordingly, either party would have the right to take whatever action it would deem necessary, including military action in appropriate circumstances, to defend the Canal against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

² See map attachment to the Annex of the Neutrality Treaty.

However, the United States would not have the right, nor would it intend, to intervene in the political processes or internal affairs of Panama. The statement thus makes clear that any United States action would be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and would not be directed against the political independence or territorial integrity of Panama.

While this provision commits the parties to maintain the Canal's neutrality, the means either party would use to accomplish that objective would be entirely within its discretion. A wide range of measures would be available. It is clearly understood, as noted in the statement of interpretation, that any decision by the United States to use military force in a particular circumstance, would be made in accordance with its Constitutional processes.

PROTOCOL TO THE NEUTRALITY TREATY

Following the ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties, a protocol to the Neutrality Treaty would be opened for accession by all nations of the world in accordance with a resolution to be sponsored by the United States and Panama in the Organization of American States. The nations acceding to this Protocol will associate themselves with the objectives of the regime of neutrality described above, and will promise that they will respect that regime and that the vessels of their registry will observe its rules. The Protocol also recognizes that the maintenance of the established regime of neutrality will ensure access to the Canal permanently on a basis of entire equality.

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Feb. 7, 1978]

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on yesterday I respectfully requested the majority leader and the minority leader to request respectfully the attendance of the distinguished Vice President when the Panama Canal treaties are laid before the Senate on tomorrow. I stated that I plan to make parliamentary inquiries as to the Senate procedure with respect to consideration of these treaties.

I feel that the Vice President and the leaders should be informed of the inquiries I intend to make, and, therefore, for the benefit of the Vice President, the Parliamentarian, the joint leadership, the Members of the Senate, and concerned citizens, I shall send to the desk and I shall ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Record the parliamentary inquiries that I plan to make on tomorrow. There are 17 inquiries, and I feel that when the Vice President gives answers to these parliamentary inquiries we will have the proper guidelines for the Senate in the consideration of these treaties. This will be one of the few times in some 50 years, I am informed, that the rules of the Senate will be used in connection with the consideration of treaties. Usually we have requests made that it be considered that all parliamentary steps have been taken down to the resolution of ratification and then we proceed to approve the treaty.

The rules, of course, provide that treaties shall first be considered in the Committee of the Whole and a set procedure is provided by the rules. That procedure will be followed with respect to this treaty. But there are still a number of questions that need a ruling, I feel in advance, by the Vice President, so we will know just the proper procedure.

So I send these inquiries to the desk and ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the inquiries were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES OF MR. ALLEN AS TO SENATE PROCEDURE FOR CONSIDERATION OF PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

1. Are there not two treaties before the Senate in the Committee of the Whole involving the Panama Canal? And will it not be necessary to complete action on one through the Resolution of Ratification before action can be commenced on the other?

2. Are the amendments to Articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty referred to in the Report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "amendments reported by the Committee" as such term is used in Senate Rule XXXVII, or will such amendments be the amendments only of the Senators who introduce and sponsor them?

3. It is not in order without unanimous consent, is it, for a Resolution of Ratification to be proposed as to a treaty until the following procedure has taken place with respect to a treaty:

- A. Consideration and report by Committee of the Whole to the full Senate;
- B. Consideration by the Senate of action by the Committee of the Whole;
- C. Consideration of other amendments; and
- D. Lying over for one day.

4. In considering each treaty by Articles, as the Rules provide, with Committee amendments, if any, to be considered first, would it not be necessary to consider amendments from the floor of the Senate as to an Article and to have a vote on such Article before amendments of any sort to the next succeeding Article could be offered or considered in the Senate?

5. If Calendar No. 1—the Neutrality Treaty is approved and Calendar No. 2—the Panama Canal Treaty is not approved by the Senate, would not the action on the Neutrality Treaty be thereby vitiated, since it is not to go into effect until the expiration of the term of Calendar No. 2—the Panama Canal Treaty.

6. For cloture to be invoked as to the treaties, would not a separate cloture motion and a separate cloture vote by at least 60 Senators on each motion be required?

7. If cloture is sought on one treaty and voted by the Senate, would it not be necessary to complete action on the clotured treaty before there could be a cloture vote on the second treaty?

8. At what point will the preamble of the treaties be before the Senate for consideration and for possible amendment and for action by the Senate?

UNANIMOUS CONSENT REQUEST

I ask unanimous consent that the "Documents Implementing the Panama Canal Treaty" and the "Other Documents" identified on page 221 of the Report of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Executive Report No. 95-12) be identified in like manner in the record at this point as predicate for my next two parliamentary inquiries.

9. Since most of the actual agreements between the United States and Panama are provided in the documents set forth in the record pursuant to the foregoing unanimous consent request, are such documents before the Senate for consideration and for vote thereon and for possible amendment prior thereto?

10. If amendments to a treaty or treaties inconsistent with the provision of the documents set forth in the record pursuant to the foregoing unanimous consent request are agreed to by the Senate, would not such amendments so adopted supplant or supercede the inconsistent provisions of such documents?

11. Executive N contains in the case of the Panama Canal Treaty an annex and an agreed minute. Additionally, the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, also within Executive N, has two annexes, each having a map attachment. At what point will the annexes, minutes, and associated attachments within Executive N be before the Committee of the Whole for consideration and possible amendment?

12. If amendments to a treaty or treaties are agreed to by the Senate and are inconsistent with the provisions contained in Executive N of the annexes, their attachments, or the agreed minute, would not such amendments so adopted supplant or supercede the inconsistent provisions in such annexes, attachments, or agreed minute?

13. Subject to the limitations that might be imposed by cloture, are not each article and each amendment to an article debatable?

14. Are not amendments offered to a treaty amendable in like manner as amendments to bills in legislative session? Are perfecting amendments to portions of the treaty sought to be amended in order?

15. In the absence of cloture, must amendments to articles be germane to the article under consideration?

16. Since both the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal are made in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, both texts being declared equally authentic, are the Spanish texts of both treaties before the Senate for consideration? If they are not, when will the Spanish language texts be presented to the Senate for consideration and comparison with the English language texts for purposes of ascertaining any discrepancies between them?

17. If the President transmits two treaties to the Senate under cover of one message and the same are received by the Senate and docketed as one executive message, if no action is taken in committee to change the manner in which the documents were transmitted, would not such documents remain in the order transmitted when reported to the Senate for consideration in the Committee of the Whole? In other words, does the Executive Clerk have authority to rearrange the documents submitted by the President?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

DISCRIMINATION IN PANAMA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, last fall I wrote to Mr. Benjamin L. Hooks, the executive director of the NAACP, to express my concern about reports that had appeared in the media describing extensive government discrimination against the black population of Panama.

Mr. Hooks responded with a most thoughtful letter reporting, ironically, not institutionalized discrimination by the Panamanian Government but discrimination by the Canal Zone Company and Canal Zone Government. Moreover, he expressed the strong support of the NAACP for ratification of the treaties.

I believe the letter well worth the consideration of my colleagues and ask, Mr. President, that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE,
New York, N.Y., November 10, 1977.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
*Office of the Minority Leader,
Senate Office Building,

DEAR HOWARD: I have been out of the office hence the delay in responding to your letter of September 8 regarding the extent of discrimination against Blacks in Panama.

The NAACP has an active branch in Panama in the Canal Zone which was organized to address many of the concerns of the local population regarding the extent of discrimination in Panama. Our branch has reported that the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone government have maintained unjust discriminatory practices in employment, housing and schools against Blacks and Panamanian citizens which has resulted in inferior living conditions and schools for Panamanians.

Based on our local branch's investigation, the NAACP adopted a resolution at its 66th Annual National Convention in 1975 strongly condemning the discrimination in employment and segregation in schools and housing in the Canal Zone and supporting the merging of the dual housing and educational systems. Since that time, our branch has continued to wage a campaign against the discriminatory practices.

The NAACP has taken a position, which I am personally and officially in favor of, that the Panama treaties should be ratified and I hope you can see your way clear to support that position.

In the mainstream of Black thought, it is felt that ratification of the treaties would be the embodiment of international cooperation and a positive and important instrument of peace and goodwill inasmuch as colonialism has long been a threat to international peace, freedom and the liberty of people of color.

Before I attended the White House Briefing on Panama, it was my personal opinion that the treaties should be ratified. Since that briefing, based on what we heard from General Brown and Secretary Brown, we believe that there is no real conflict in the ratification of the treaties and our military position.

I am reminded of a very serious meeting some years ago involving coal miners and the President was going to call out the National Guard. John L. Lewis is reported to have said, "You can't dig very much coal with bayonets."

Again, I am sorry for the delay in getting this letter to you. I really thought that I had already sent it and just discovered that I had not.

Sincerely,

BENJAMIN L. HOOKS,
Executive Director.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 20 AND 21

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, today I am submitting on behalf of the distinguished minority leader, Mr. Baker, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Sparkman, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Case, the distinguished minority whip, Mr. Stevens, the distinguished majority whip, Mr. Cranston, and 72 other Senators, making a total of 78 Senators, two amendments to the Panama Canal treaties which we feel represent a fundamental and essential improvement in strengthening the documents.

Since I first had the opportunity to review the treaties in September, it has been apparent to me that it would be necessary to clarify and guarantee two very important points:

First. The right of the United States to take action to defend the canal and to assure that it will remain open after the year 2000 open for neutral use; and Second. Expeditious, or "head-of-the-line," passage through the canal for U.S. military vessels in time of need or emergency.

The critical importance of these two issues clearly emerged in the hearings on the treaties before the Foreign Relations Committee.

A detailed study of the treaties, the public debate across the Nation, and a careful analysis of the hearings, have led us to conclude that articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty should be amended accordingly.

We feel article IV should be amended to insure that the United States shall have the unchallenged right to take action on its own, if necessary, to defend the canal against any aggression directed against the canal or the peaceful transit of vessels.

Furthermore, article VI should be amended to provide that U.S. war and auxiliary vessels shall have the unquestionable right in the case or need to go to the head of the line in order to transit the canal rapidly.

These two amendments will formalize into the text of the treaties, if these amendments are adopted, the statement of understanding agreed to by President Carter and by Gen. Omar Torrijos, the Panamanian leader, October 14, 1977.

It is important that this statement of understanding was agreed to and publicized in General Torrijos, televised address to his people prior to the October 23, 1977, Panamanian plebiscite on the treaties.

Mr. President, these amendments have the bipartisan endorsement of the Senate leadership, together with Senator Sparkman, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Senator Case, ranking member of the committee, as well as the cosponsorship of 74 others of our colleagues, as I say, making a total of 78 Senators who are sponsoring these amendments.

It is our belief that these two amendments will clear up any uncertainty surrounding the critical issues of the United States' right to defend the canal, as well as priority passage through the canal in time of emergency or need.

Mr. President, in addition to these 78 sponsors of this amendment, there are Senators who have indicated that they will support the amendment but for various reasons of their own they preferred not to join at this time as co-sponsors of the amendments.

Mr. President, I send the amendments to the desk and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Record as in executive session and that the list of co-sponsors also be shown.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. Robert C. Byrd, (for himself, Mr. Allen, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Baker, Mr. Bartlett, Mr. Bayh, Mr. Bentsen, Mr. Biden, Mr. Brooke, Mr. Bumpers, Mr. Burdick, Mr. Case, Mr. Chafee, Mr. Chiles, Mr. Church, Mr. Clark, Mr. Cranston, Mr. Danforth, Mr. DeConcini, Mr. Domenici, Mr. Durkin, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Ford, Mr. Garn, Mr. Glenn, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Gravel, Mr. Hansen, Mr. Hart, Mr. Haskell, Mr. Hatch, Mr. Paul G. Hatfield, Mr. Hathaway, Mr. Heinz, Mr. Hollings, Mr. Huddleston, Mrs. Humphrey, Mr. Inouye, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Javits, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Laxalt, Mr. Leahy, Mr. Lugar, Mr. Mathias, Mr. Matsunaga, Mr. McClure, Mr. McGovern, Mr. Metzenbaum, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Moynihan, Mr. Muskie, Mr. Nelson, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Packwood, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Pell, Mr. Percy, Mr. Randolph, Mr. Ribicoff, Mr. Riegle, Mr. Roth, Mr. Sarbanes, Mr. Sasser, Mr. Schmitt, Mr. Schweiker, Mr. Sparkman, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Stone, Mr. Talmadge, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Tower, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Weicker, Mr. Williams, and Mr. Young) submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to Executive N, 95-1, the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

AMENDMENT No. 20

At the end of Article IV, insert the following:

"A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

AMENDMENT No. 21

At the end of the first paragraph of Article VI, insert the following:

"In accordance with the Statement of Understanding mentioned in Article IV above: The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And Mr. President, the amendments will be printed overnight, will they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that it will be.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

THE AMERICAN CONTRIBUTION TO PANAMA'S PROSPERITY

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, one of the most frequently repeated arguments in support of the proposed Panama Canal Treaties is the claim that Panama is a "colonial enclave" and a victim of U.S. "exploitation." This argument, reminiscent of Marxist dialectics, fails to take into account the fact that Panama has received very substantial benefits because of U.S. investments in the zone, to say nothing of American largesse in terms of foreign aid. Contrary to the false impressions created by the State Department, these benefits amount to a solid contribution to every major facet of Panama's economy.

A recent letter appearing in the Baltimore Sun does much towards elucidating, in a dispassionate and factual manner, this little publicized aspect of our relationship with Panama. I ask unanimous consent that the letter, by Mr. Martin D. Tullai of Brooklandville, Md., be printed in the Record for the benefit of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Jan. 23, 1978]

AMERICAN BENEVOLENCE IN PANAMA

Sir: As the U.S. Senate prepares to face its moment of truth regarding the Panama Canal Treaties, there seems to be a revival of the absurd contention that the U.S. has been the aggressive exploiter of Panama. Myths like this, repeated often enough, die hard. And one would be remiss to allow them to stand without refutation, for a dispassionate appraisal of the facts reveals otherwise.

Although no more than a pestilential swamp in 1903, Panama is today a fairly prosperous nation almost entirely due to our generosity and monies that poured into the region because of the canal. Panama has been and still is the greatest single beneficiary of the canal enterprise. Harold R. Parfitt, governor, Panama Canal Zone, has testified that, "the presence of the Panama Canal has infused much money into the Panamanian economy, and is responsible for the high standard of living in that part of Central America." This claim is not difficult to substantiate. Consider some facts:

(1) There is an inflow to the economy of Panama of between $240 million and $250 million annually. In addition, it receives an annuity of $2,328,000. The initial annuity was set at $250,000. In 1936, this was increased to $430,000, it was raised again in 1955 to $1,930,000. Today it stands at the aforementioned $2,328,000.

This is not a rental fee as some have mistakenly construed. It was an annuity designed to assume the annual franchise payment which the Panama Railroad formerly paid to Colombia. It did not affect the status of the Canal Zone, but was the obligation of the railroad to Colombia. This obligation was not assumed by the United States which paid Panama the annuity or "compensation." This is not a rental or lease—these words do not appear in the treaty, but significantly, the term "grants" appears 19 times.

(2) The canal is larger than any other single source of employment in Panama. About 10,000 people—72 per cent of the total work force of the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government—are Panamanian nationals, thousands more work for the U.S. military.

(3) Panama has the highest per capita income in all of Central America ($1,375) and stands fourth of 19 nations in all of Latin America. It has twice the per capita wealth of Colombia, the nation from whom she declared her independence.

(4) The U.S. has favored Panama with more per capita foreign aid than any other country in the world. Between 1947 and 1973, this amounted to $342 million.

(5) American businessmen have contributed to Panama's economy with investments approximating $250 million.

(6) Until 1975, Panama had one of the lowest inflation rates in Latin America.

(7) In addition to direct economic boosts, Panama has gained much from a variety of beneficent projects. These include a bridge and highway across the Canal, built at U.S. expense to link the two parts of Panama; the country's deep water ports are U.S. built and operated; its principal international airfield was U.S. built, the U.S. constructed its transisthmian road and railroad; Panama's water supply comes largely from reservoirs and purification systems constructed by the U.S. its sanitation system was primarily the result of U.S. efforts; and U.S.-owned merchant ships flying Panama's flag of convenience add to her economic well-being, just as tourism, attracted by the Canal, adds many dollars to the merchants' coffers.

(8) The picture of health and social statistics is also quite striking. After the French failure, due largely to tropical fevers, U.S. physicians and scientists conquered the endemic, devastating diseases. They sanitized Panamanian swamps and established an extremely effective health system. Some results of these programs point up their successes:

Panama's infant mortality per 1,000 live births in 1970 was 3.0—lowest in all of Latin America, Argentina's being 60.1, Brazil's 85 to 95, Bolivia's 159.0 and Haiti's 149.1; Panamanians have the fourth best life expectancy in Latin America—66.5 years; at 5.3 per thousand, its mortality rate in 1974 was the second lowest in Latin America; Panama's literacy rate of 84.0 stands fifth in all of Latin America—well above fourteen other nations of that region.

These obvious benefits have made Panama, despite its unstable and dictatorial government, one of the most favored nations in all of Latin America. Far from being exploited, it is evident that Panama's well-being has been greatly enhanced by the American presence in the Canal Zone. The canal is Panama's greatest single revenue source.

Hanson Baldwin, noted military expert and writer for the New York Times, has declared: "The exploitation myth is just that: a propaganda ploy fostered by Panama's politicians, by Castro's Cuba and by the Soviet bloc to help force the United States out of the zone. It has no basis in fact."

MARTIN D. TULLAI.

PROFESSOR BERGER'S REPLY TO LOUIS POLLAK

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as my colleagues are aware, I have submitted an amendment to the Panama Canal Treaties which provides that these agreements shall enter into force only after both houses of Congress have enacted legislation authorizing the transfer of Canal Zone territory and property to the Republic of Panama.

This amendment is necessary because there are, in my judgment, no adequate precedents to support the assumption that the Chief Executive has the authority to dispose of U.S. territory by treaty alone. The testimony of State Department and Justice Department representatives, as well as constitutional scholars appearing before congressional committees, has persuaded me that the territorial clause of the Constitution, which gives Congress exclusive power over the disposal of U.S. territory, would be violated if the House of Representatives is bypassed regarding the transfer of the zone to Panama.

Especially noteworthy in this regard is the testimony of the eminent constitutional scholar, Raoul Berger, whose searching analysis shows, beyond peradventure, that these treaties, as presently drafted, seek to expand the treaty-making powers of the Chief Executive beyond the limits of the Constitution—see Congressional Record, January 26, 1978, pages S596-S599.

On January 30, 1978, however, my distinguished colleague from Iowa (Mr. Clark) called to the Senate's attention an interesting paper, written by Dean Louis Pollak of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, which purports to demonstrate the fallacies of Berger's testimony. Unmoved and unshaken, Professor Berger finds that Dean Pollak's critique simply confirms his own belief that there is no constitutional basis for the extraordinary exercise of Presidential power that is contemplated under these treaties.

Professor Berger has favored me with a copy of his reply to Pollak's paper which I would like to share with my colleagues. Of particular significance is Berger's observation that the Pollak paper has added confusion to the controversy by misstating the constitutional issue. As Senator Clark pointed out one of Pollak's important conclusions is "that the discussion in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 confirms the settled understanding of our treaty-makers and of the Supreme Court that territory belonging to the United States may be ceded by treaty." This conclusion detracts little from the strength of Berger's analysis, of course, for the simple reason that no one—including Berger—has denied that the treaty power extends to the disposal of U.S. territory. The real issue, as Berger explains, is whether the Chief Executive has the power to dispose of U.S. territory by a self-executing treaty, thereby circumventing Congress.

Mr. President, I believe that any Senator who fairly and impartially studies the constitutional question that is before us, and subjects the different interpretations of the precedents offered by Berger and Pollak to an objective and forthright analysis, will conclude that the weight of authority clearly supports the view that these transfers under the treaties cannot take effect until Congress has approved them.

To assist the Senate in its consideration of this matter, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Raoul Berger's response to Dean Pollak's paper be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

To: Senator Dick Clark.

From: Raoul Berger.

Re Panama Canal Treaty: Dean Louis Pollak's Reply.

Date: February 1978.

Dean Louis Pollak has favored me with a copy of his critique of my statement before the Subcommittee on the Separation of Powers addressed to you under date of January 19, 1978. I am honored by his expressions of esteem, and his sentiments are warmly reciprocated. High regard for his attainments, however, may not inhibit the expression of scholarly differences on a great constitutional issue; it requires careful study of the alleged infirmities that have persuaded him that I am in error.

At the outset I must disclaim the version of the issue that he attributes to me, namely that the Panama cession "cannot be effectuated by treaty, but only by statute." My objection is to a "self-executing" treaty because Article IV of the Constitution requires Congress' consent to the disposition.

The starting point of analysis must be the Constitution itself not what others have said about it. A great British scholar, W. S. McKechnie, faced by contrary opinion by respected scholars, stated, "the truth of historical questions does not depend on the counting of votes or the weight of authority" but rather on the historical record.¹ So too, in the construction of the Constitution, the document is always here to speak for itself. On this score I cannot improve upon John C. Calhoun, then a Congressman, whose remarks in the House respecting the treaty power are quoted in extenso by Dean Pollak, stating that Calhoun explained "with more precision than either [Marshall or Story] achieved, the scope of the treaty power and the constraints which other parts of the Constitution impose upon its exercise." Said Calhoun: "Whatever limits are imposed in those general terms ought to be the results of the construction of the instrument." The treaty power Calhoun continued is competent "to regulate all subjects" that require "the consent of another nation."

provided, and here are its true limits, such regulations are not inconsistent with the Constitution. If so they are void. No treaty can * * * do that differently which is directed to be done in a particular given mode. (emphasis added).

Quoted Pollak 7-8. In terms of the present issue, a treaty may not "dispose" of the Panama Canal without the consent of Congress because Article IV confers that power on Congress.

Here Calhoun applies a rule of construction—the specific governs the general—upon which the administration has refrained from comment, and which remains unmentioned by Dean Pollak: "A broad statutory provision will not apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same act."² Then there is the complementary rule—express mention implies exclusion of the unmentioned—or as held by the Supreme Court, "When a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode."³ Although the exclusion of the treaty power was not before the Court, it tacitly ratified the application of the foregoing rules when it stated that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property which could interfere with this right" * * *⁴

From the beginning such rules of construction were respected; Justice Story recommended the "excellent summary of the rules for construing statutes" in Bacon's Abridgment.⁵ If there is any doubt as to the legislative intent—Deputy Assistant Attorney General Ralph E. Erickson testified in 1971 (before Panama became a political issue) that the issue "is not altogether free from doubt."⁶—such rules serve as a guide to construction. Such "doubt" counsels against invasion of a power explicitly conferred on Congress; a clear case for the "concurrent power" is needed in the teeth of the express grant.

The treaty power is given to the President "with the advice and consent of the Senate." Without question the House is thereby excluded from participation in treaty making. By parity of reasoning, the "Congress shall have power to dispose" equally bars its exercise by the President and Senate. It is no adequate answer to say, as does Dean Pollak, that the "Congress shall have power" phrase "syntactically, does not preclude concurrent jurisdiction in the President and Senate as treaty makers," (Pollak 4), for grammatical syntax must yield to established canons of construction which show that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority." One who disputes the results to which traditional canons lead has the burden of proof to show they are inapplicable.

Dean Pollak leads off with an appeal to John Marshall's remarks as a young Congressman on the Jay Treaty. In considering these and other treaty remarks, it is constantly necessary to distinguish between the treaty making process and any subsequent exercise of power by the House. That distinction was clearly drawn by Marshall. Washington had submitted the treaty for ratification to the Senate along with some instructions to the Minister who had negotiated it; but he refused them to the House on the ground that it had no right to participate in treaty making.⁷ Among the objections by the House, to quote Albert Beveridge's "Life of John Marshall," invoked by Dean Pollak, were that though the "treaty regulated commerce * * * the House had not been consulted," that though "the raising and expending of public money must originate in the House," it had been ignored. The question raised, said Beveridge, was "whether a commercial treaty, or an international compact requiring an appropriation of money * * * could be made without the concurrence of the House as well as the Senate."

To this Marshall replied that it was "'more in the spirit of the Constitution' for the National House to refuse support after ratification than to have a treaty 'stified in embryo' by the House passing on it before ratification."⁸ Exclusion of the House from treaty making did not mean for Marshall that the House would be denied its function after ratification. Dean Pollak reads this as a "tactical concession" that was "not at odds with Marshall's constitutional definition of the potential scope of the treaty power." (Pollak 3n). If this was merely a "tactical concession" then his entire statement was a political "tactic", for Marshall gave no clue as to when he spoke as politician and when as constitutional sage.

Attorney General Griffin B. Bell conceded in his statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 29, 1977, pp. 4-5, that the Senate and President may not "bypass the power of Congress and in particular the House of Representatives" in the "raising of revenue or expenditure of funds." What distinguishes "all bills * * * shall originate in the House" from "The Congress shall have power to dispose?" The thinness of the distinction is underlined by the State Department's concession that "treaties may [not] impose taxes."⁹ Nothing in the Article I, 8(1) "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes" distinguishes it from the Article IV "The Congress shall have power to dispose."

JUDICIAL DECISIONS

Boundary dispute cases

The "boundary dispute" cases invoked by the administration are tacitly abandoned by Dean Pollak, presumably because, as he quotes Justice Story:

"In the case of a contested boundary, there is no pretence to say that an ascertainment of the true boundary involves the question of cession (Pollak, Appendix A, p. 3).

This was the ground upon which I dismissed those cases.

But Dean Pollak's reference to Story was for the purpose of showing his awareness "that the treaty power includes authority to cede American Territory. * * *" Governor Edward Everett of Massachusetts had written Story with respect to the Northeastern boundary, that in his words presented "a question not of ceding an admitted portion of Maine, but of ascertaining the boundary between the British territory and ours." (Pollak, Appendix, p.1) As we have seen, Story concurred in this view. Everett sought Story's advice regarding a resolution by the Massachusetts legislature "That no power delegated by the Constitution to the government of the United States authorizes them to cede to any foreign nation any territory lying within the limits of either of the States of the Union." Id., (emphasis added).

Of course, Story rejected this drastic restriction, and added that Marshall "was unequivocally of opinion, that the treaty-making power did extend to cases of cession of territory, though he would not undertake to say that it could extend to all cases. * * *" Id. 3. Presumably what Marshall had in mind were the boundary disputes that called for settlement in his time. I would not deny that the President and Senate may enter into a treaty for the cession of territory; what is disputed is whether such a treaty may be "self-executing," without the subsequent consent of Congress under Article IV. Nor can Story's letter be read to repudiate the statement in his Commentaries that "The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal."¹⁰

Indian treaty cases

(1) Dean Pollak follows the administration view of Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1, 10 (1899), quoting "that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress." (Pollak 10). But there the grant was made by the tribe, not the United States. The treaty had "set apart from the tract hereby ceded [by the tribe] a reservation of six hundred and forty acres" for an individual Indian, and the issue was what kind of title did he take. The Court, as I showed, quoted from an opinion of Attorney General Roger Taney:

"These reservation are excepted out of the grant made by the treaty, and did not therefore pass with it; consequently the title remains as it was before the treaty, that is to say, the lands reserved are still held under the original Indian title."

The Court held that "the reservation, unless accompanied by words limiting its effect, is equivalent to a present grant of complete title in fee simple."¹¹ Dean Pollak states that "the Taney opinion * * * was discussed by the Court and rejected as not controlling." (Pollak 11n). Only a not relevant portion of the opinion was held not controlling, the Taney clause immediately following the above quotation: "and therefore 'the Indian occupants cannot convey them to individuals, and no valid cession can be made of their interest but to the United States.'" (emphasis added).

Within a year of Taney's opinion, said the Court, Congress in a new Act "omitted the prohibition, contained in former statutes, of purchase or lease from 'any Indian'" and adopted an "altered form." Hence the Court concluded that "Congress did not intend that there should thenceforth be a general restriction upon the alienation by individual Indians of sections of land reserved to them respectively by a treaty with the United States. 175 U.S. at 12-13 (emphasis added.) In short, only that portion of Taney's opinion that denied to individual Indians the right to alienate their property was deemed "not controlling," because superseded by an Act of Congress; the power of Indian tribes to "reserve" portions of ceded property to individual Indians was left untouched.

It is not necessary to go into the Court's discussion of the nature of the reserved title, e.g. was it legal or equitable, arising from the fact that Indian lands were held in common; there were no individual titles. Suffice it to set out the Court's quotation from Doe v. Wilson, 25 How. 457, 463-464 (1859):

"The Pottawatomie nation was the owner of the possessory right of the country ceded, and all the subjects of the nation were joint owners of it. The reservees took by the treaty, directly from the nation, the Indian title." 175 U.S. at 15.

The continued validity of Taney's statement that title "reserved" to individual Indians does not pass to the United States may be gathered from Francis v. Francis, 203 U.S. 233, 238 (1906), which cites Jones v. Meehan for the proposition that when a treaty makes "a reservation of a specified number of sections of land * * * the treaty itself converts the reserved land into individual property."

(2) Apparently Dean Pollak concurs with my reading of Percheman v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet. 0 51 (1833)). Percheman was cited by Attorney General Bell to show that "the Court held self-executing certain clauses of the Florida Treaty with Spain which related to the regulations of property rights in newly acquired territory."¹³ Those were property rights of individuals, not of the United States, and therefore irrelevant to Article IV. The treaty secured to private individuals grants that theretofore had been made to them by the Spanish King, being akin to "reserves" of the Indian treaties. Dean Pollak agrees that "Marshall held that the Treaty of Spain of 1819 had of its own force confirmed the titles of pre-treaty owners of Florida land ceded to the United States by the treaty." (Pollak 12n.; emphasis added).

But Dean Pollak states that ("Percheman held that the interpretation of the 1819 treaty approved in Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829) (a case relied on by Mr. Berger * * *) was in error," Id. I cited foster for the statement that "the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be by the act of the Legislature," i.e. Congress. Percheman held that no ratification was required because the Court discovered that the Spanish counterpart version of the treaty dispensed with all ratification, a fact not known to the Foster Court. 32 U.S. at 89. This does not repudiate the Foster holding that if ratification is required, it falls to Congress.

(3) There is no need to belabor Dean Pollak's mention of Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211, 247 (1872), for Attorney General Bell granted that at best it was a "strong dictum," noting that "The Court conceded that the question was immaterial in the case because Congress has actually implemented and ratified that particular treaty."¹⁴ Although Dean Pollak relies on dicta running in his favor, he rejects as dicta judicial statements that the Congressional power to dispose is "exclusive." (Pollak 14). In fact the latter are not dicta, but were essential to decision as I shall prove by Dean Pollak. He recognizes that Sioux Tribe v. United States, 316 U.S. 317 (1942), "properly held presidential power over federal lands to be subordinate to the Congressional power," consequently the Court's reference to Congress "exclusive" power was immediately relevant to decision, not dictum. So too, Wisconsin Central R.R. Co. v. Price, 33 U.S. 496, 504 (1890), which stated that Article IV "implies an exclusion of all other authority over the property . . ." held, according to Dean Pollak, "state authority over federal lands to be subordinate to Congressional authority," again relevant to decision. Such holdings were earlier expressed by Justice Story as a general principle: "The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal. * * *"¹⁵ True, that principle has yet to be applied to the treaty power (as is equally true of Dean Pollak's citations), but it derives not from dicta but from statements essential to decision, whereas Holden v. Joy concededly is pure dictum. For this reason, I consider the cases I cite as more worthy of credence than the dictum of Holden v. Joy.

(4) Repeatedly Dean Pollak dwells on the "classic exposition," the "classic formulation of the [treaty] power in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890)." (Pollak 4n., 12). That case had not the slightest bearing on the effect of Article IV for it had nothing to do with either the disposition or regulation of government property. Under a treaty providing for reciprocal rights of inheritance by citizens of the respective countries, it was held that a Frenchman could take land by descent in the District of Columbia. In Dean Pollak's view, "Geofroy v. Riggs is a particular illustration of the capacity of treaties to regulate matters delegated to Congress: That case applied to rights of inheritance in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding that Article I, 8(17) confers the power of 'exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever' relating to the District." (Pollak 12n.). That still does not stretch to "regulation" by treaty of United States property and therefore in nowise diminishes Congress' power to dispose of it. Moreover, the treaty of 1853 conferred the right only in States "whose existing laws permit it" (the Court held the District a State for purposes of the treaty), and though the Act of March 7, 1887, forbade ownership of land in the District to aliens, it excepted the disposition of lands "secured by existing treaties" to them,¹⁶ which the Court held included realty "acquired by inheritance." 133 U.S. at 272. Thus the treaty did not pretend to override local law to the contrary, and Congress had consented to application of the treaty to inheritance by Frenchmen.

(5) Finally, Dean Pollak summons Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 1416 (1920), for the proposition that the treaty makers can "empower Congress to enact legislation going beyond its specifically enumerated grants of power." (Pollak 18). That, with all due respect, is a startling proposition. For the Founders, in the words of George Nicholas in the Virginia Ratification Convention, held that no treaty can be "inconsistent with the delegated powers,"¹⁷ let alone confer additional, undelegated powers. Lee assured that Convention that "When a question arises with respect to the legality of any power, exercised or assumed by Congress [the question will be] * * * is it enumerated in the Constitution? * * * It is otherwise arbitrary and unconstitutional."¹⁸ The reservation of undelegated powers to the people by the Tenth Amendment was not made subject to treaty; additional power requires a grant from the people by amendment. Madison, chief architect of the Constitution, said, "Had the power of making treaties, for example, been omitted, however necessary it might have been, the defect could only have been lamented, or supplied by an amendment to the Constitution."¹⁸

For present purposes it suffices that Missouri v. Holland had nothing to do with the disposition or regulation of United States property. It arose out of a State challenge to a treaty with Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds which annually traversed parts of United States and Canada. Justice Holmes stated that "The whole question is whether it is forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment." Since, he held, "Wild birds are not in the possession of any one; and possession is the beginning of ownership,"¹⁹ the State could assert no property interest, and by the same reasoning, neither could the United States Missouri v. Holland is therefore wholly irrelevant to the power by treaty to dispose of property of the United States.

THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Here I ruefully confess error in one particular, though it does not vitiate my basic analysis. Dean Pollak correctly charges me with an erroneous inference drawn from the Morris-Sherman remarks, which were not in fact "subsequent" to the discussion of the treaty power." (Pollak 16-17). I myself had caught the error and confessed it before the House Committee on Merchant Marine on January 18, 1978, a copy of which statement is attached hereto. As I there explained (p. 11):

"When [the Attorney General's statement before the Foreign Relations Committee] reached me late of a Saturday afternoon, as appears in my own Senate statement, I had only about two days to prepare my comments before having them typed and forwarded to the Senate Committee. Pressure of time conduces to oversights, and I was mistaken respecting a time sequence and in following the Attorney General's erroneous identification of a motion made by Williamson and Spaight with one he attributed to Sherman and Morris. Leisure for reflection and further research has since enabled me to correct such inaccuracies and to sharpen my analysis."

Such oversights are regrettable, even though induced by undue pressure of time and accentuated by lack of secretarial service and a corps of research assistants such as the administration can devote to the task.

The Attorney General was guilty of a similar oversight in emphasizing a remark on the treaty power by George Mason during a debate on whether the Senate could share in originating revenue bills.²⁰ For Mason spoke before the Article IV progenitor had been proposed and referred to the Committee on Detail, and of course before the resultant "disposition" provision was debated.²¹ M. Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, 297, 321, 324, 466 (1911). Manifestly Mason's earlier remark hardly expressed the view that the treaty power overrode the as yet unborn "power to dispose."

There is no need to repeat the fresh analysis on more thorough research that is set forth at pages 12-17 of my attached statement before the House Committee on Merchant Marine. Throughout, all that was under discussion was the performance of the Senate's own "advice and consent" function, whether it should turn on more or less than a two-thirds vote, without a hint of desire to curtail the House function under Article IV. It was one thing to insist that the Senate, in the performance of its own function, must act by a two thirds vote, and something else again to court the wrath of those who placed their faith in the more democratic House and were already displeased by the exclusion of the House from treaty making, by further reducing its role under Article IV. There is not, I repeat, the slightest hint in the history of an intention to do so. More is required to deprive the Article IV language of its clear meaning.

It remains to comment on Dean Pollak's rejection of my reminder that what the President seeks today with the "advice and consent" of the Senate he may next time seek to accomplish single-handedly by executive agreement. (Pollak 19n.) Doubtless you are familiar with the rapid proliferation of executive agreements in recent years, a label pasted on a treaty to avoid the necessity of submission to the Senate.²² When Senator J. William Fulbright was chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, he complained that the State Department submitted treaties for "the most trivial matters" but declined to submit them for agreements respecting Spanish bases and the like. As he ironically told Secretary of State Rogers, "something as important as stationing troops and the payment of millions of dollars is proper for an executive agreement."²³

Dean Pollak dismisses my concerns "about the aggrandizement of executive authority" as "not pertinent—indeed, they may properly be termed impertinent—

when a President, acting in meticulous conformity with the procedure specified in the Constitution, has asked the Senate to fulfill the partnership role in making of treaties which the President expressly contemplates." (Pollak 19n.)

Since fulfillment of that "partnership role" (for which I broke more than one lance) was many times frustrated by attaching the "executive agreement" label to treaties, I may be pardoned for being skeptical about the rake's reform. Permit me to close with the words of Alexander Hamilton, the great proponent of expansive presidential power:

An agent cannot new model his own commission. A treaty cannot transfer the legislative power to the executive department.²³

ORDER OF PROCEDURE—PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I would hope that our respective cloakrooms would urge Senators who have special orders to be in the Chamber and ready to proceed with their statements under the orders. It is important that no later than 12:15 p.m. today, if at all possible, the Senate proceed with its consideration of the first treaty on the Executive Calendar. National public radio is geared up to broadcast the proceedings and has been told the proceedings will begin then.

There will be a rollcall vote today on the adoption of the conference report, after which the Senate will go into executive session to consider the first treaty.

To accommodate public radio and network feeding off the audio transmission I would hope that Senators who wish to present speeches will present them so that the Senate will be able to proceed at that time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, might I ask the distinguished majority leader if he can indicate to me the probable course of our proceeding today.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I would anticipate that when the Senate goes into executive session, of course, Mr. Sparkman, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, should have the opportunity to address himself to the first treaty, and then Mr. Case, the ranking minority member, should have the opportunity to address the treaty.

However, I would also anticipate that the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) may wish to propound some parliamentary inquiries right at the very beginning, when we go into executive session, so as to help clarify the rules and to be sure of our guidelines.

I may want to propound some inquiries, because, after all, this is the first time in 55 years that the Senate will have operated under the Committee of the Whole procedure, requiring the reading of a treaty article by article. It will be a new experience for all Senators today in the Chamber.

I would say that parliamentary inquiries will be discussed first. The Vice President will be in the chair to respond to those inquiries. They may very well consume 1 hour at the most. After that, I would hope that the two proponents will proceed, and then perhaps those opposed to the treaties.

I believe the distinguished minority leader is prepared to state the names of Senators who will proceed on his side.

Mr. BAKER. The majority leader is correct. I think this is eminently a practical and equitable approach. While there is no limitation on time or control of time, I think this gives a fair shot to everybody on the opening day.

On behalf of the opponents, it is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) and the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) will wish to make statements today in response, presumably, to the opening statements by Senator Sparkman and Senator Case, the chairman and the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Might I ask the distinguished majority leader further whether he, as majority leader, has plans to speak today or tomorrow in advance of the general debate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. My plan is not to speak today.

I would think that once those four Senators I have named have spoken, there may be other Senators, depending upon what the time situation is at the moment, who will want to address their remarks to the treaties today.

I would imagine that the debate will resume tomorrow at 10 or 11 in the morning and last until 6 or 7 in the evening, and on Friday from about 9 in the morning until 5 in the afternoon. We will want to attempt to proceed in a way which will allow Senators to gain recognition when and as they can. Our respective sides would be well advised to attempt to keep things moving. Many times we do have Senators who are in the Chamber but are not ready to speak. We should keep in mind that we have audio transmission to inform the public as to the debate on the treaties.

In the first 2 or 3 days, I would think we can lay out at the beginning of the day the names of a few of the speakers who will deliver remarks on that day.

Mr. BAKER. I agree with the majority leader. I might say, by way of information to my colleague, that yesterday, during the regular weekly luncheon meeting of the Republican policy group, I indicated that we have both opponents and proponents on both sides of the aisle in this case. For my part, I wanted it known that I wished to serve both sides in trying to arrange the details of our procedure. Whether for or against the treaties, those on my side of the aisle should advise me of their wishes in this respect. I would be happy to advise the majority leader to see if we can keep a steady flow of debate rather than start and stop as sometimes occurs.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. While we are waiting for the first speaker, I should say at this point it will be in order, once we are in executive session, to have amendments proposed on each article as that article is reached in its sequence, and votes could occur on such amendments or the tabling motions of such amendments. So there is a possibility of rollcall votes today, tomorrow, and Friday.

I should rather think that for the most part the time in the remainder of this week will likely be consumed in debate.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the majority leader. I join him in that estimate. I think that will provide for an orderly transition into the general and sustained debate on these matters after we return from our Lincoln Day nonlegislative period.

Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for taking the time today to answer these inquiries and to volunteer a good schedule of activities for this week, so that everyone can make his plans. I am sure all Senators will find that very helpful.

REPORT OF DELEGATION STUDYING THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES AND OTHER MATTERS OF INTEREST TO THE UNITED STATES (SEN.
DOC. NO. 95-80)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, pursuant to Senate Resolution 179 adopted at the end of the session last year, it was my privilege to lead a delegation of Senators to Panama and certain other Latin American countries. I am today filing a report of that trip, and I ask unanimous consent that the report on the trip be printed as a Senate document.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the majority leader for his indulgence.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session to proceed to the consideration of Executive N, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st Session, treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the treaty will now be considered as in Committee of the Whole, article by article.

Are there amendments to article I?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I believe that it might be well for certain rules and precedents to be clarified at the beginning of the debate. I think it will facilitate a better understanding on the part of all Senators and on the part of the press, as well as the people in the communications media, if this is done.

I read from a committee print of the role of the Senate in treaty ratification, a staff memorandum to the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate:

The Committee of the Whole procedure requiring the reading of a treaty article by article has not been used in recent memory. A quick search of the Record indicates this procedure was last followed in 1922, during the Senate's consideration of the treaty with Japan concerning the disposition of certain islands in the Pacific.

While we have been in Committee of the Whole on occasions, I take it from the reading of this text that the reading of a treaty article by article in the Committee of the Whole has not occurred in the last 55 years.

I address a question to Senators at this point as to whether or not there will be any objection—and I take it that I know the answer already—to waiving the requirement of the rule that articles be read in sequence during the procedures in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I will object to any consideration other than the consideration that the rule require that they be considered article by article. I certainly would have no objection—and I am sure there would be no objection in the Senate—to merely waiving the full reading of the treaty, provided it is understood that that in no way interferes with the consideration article by article.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator has answered my question, and there would be an objection to waiving the requirement that the articles be read in accordance with the rule, article by article and in sequence. So I will not propound that request, since it would be a request in vain, and I respect the distinguished Senator from Alabama for his insistence upon following the procedures precisely as the rule would require. However, I take the floor at this time to suggest—if we may have the indulgence of the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the ranking member thereof, Mr. Sparkman and Mr. Case, respectively—that we attempt at the beginning to establish a full clarification of certain rules and precedents. I am sure Mr. Allen is prepared to proceed to do this, and so am I, and there may be others.

So if we may go ahead with this procedure before we have the opening statements by the chairman and the ranking member, I would suggest just that.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to the distinguished majority leader for allowing me to proceed at this time. I also express my appreciation to my distinguished senior colleague, Mr. Sparkman, and the distinguished minority leader, Mr. Baker, and the ranking Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Case, for allowing me to proceed at this time.

On Monday, I did express the hope that the Vice President would be in the chair at the time Executive N is laid before the Senate for consideration, in order that we might clear the air as to some of the complex phases of the rules governing consideration of treaties.

I must say, Mr. President, that I have not in the past drawn much comfort from rulings of Vice Presidents on parliamentary procedure. But I feel that the answers to these parliamentary inquiries will be so clear and the answer so indicated by the rules that we can have a full understanding and a proper guideline for consideration of these matters and that we will not from time to time have to raise points of order as to procedure.

My chief reason for feeling that the matter should be considered in the Committee of the Whole is that the rules provide a definite procedure for consideration of a treaty in the Committee of the Whole—that is, that the treaty must be considered article by article, that amendments must be offered to that article; whereas, the committee amendments, if any, would have precedence before a vote can be taken on a succeeding article, or, before amendments can be offered to a succeeding article, all amendments to the first article must be considered and there must be a final vote on that article.

Further, while the matter is in the Committee of the Whole, no resolution of ratification could be offered. That would have to come after the matter is considered by the Senate and lies over 1 day.

With the indulgence of the Chair and the Members of the Senate, I should like to propound parliamentary inquiries to the Chair. At the request of the Chair, I did reduce these inquiries to writing, in order that the questions might be studied by the Chair and by the Parliamentarian.

Mr. President, are there not two treaties before the Senate in the Committee of the Whole involving the Panama Canal? And will it not be necessary to complete action on one through the Resolution of Ratification before action can be commenced on the other?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator means there are two treaties in the Panama Canal package, the answer is "yes." If he means that the two treaties will be before the Senate at the same time, the answer is "no."

As to the second part of his question, it will not be necessary to complete action on one before action can be commenced on the other. The Senate could, if it chose, go to the second treaty before completing action on the first.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand.

I might state to the Chair that I believe an effort will be made, after the recess, to reverse the order set by the committee and the leadership for consideration of these treaties and go back to the order in which the treaties were sent to the Senate by the President under Executive N. It may well be that that would be the first vote that the Senate takes on these treaties.

Are the amendments to articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty referred to in the report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "amendments reported by the committee" as such term is used in Senate Rule XXXVII, or will such amendments be the amendments only of the Senators who offer and sponsor them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If called up, these will be the amendments of the Senators who introduce and sponsor them.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair. I might state that I am a cosponsor of the leadership's resolution. I feel that that would be an improvement on the treaty. However, being a cosponsor of the leadership resolution, I feel that I am free to point out defects and shortcomings in the leadership amendments, and it will be my purpose and the purpose of other Senators of like mind to seek to improve on the leadership amendments, even though we may be cosponsors. I do not feel that approval of the leadership amendments would be decisive of the issue at all, because I believe that is overlooking the basic thrust of the treaties and the shortcomings and the ill-advised nature of the treaties themselves.

Mr. President, it is not in order without unanimous consent, is it, for a resolution of ratification to be proposed as to a treaty until the following procedure has taken place with respect to a treaty:

(a) Consideration and report by the Committee of the Whole to the full Senate;

(b) Consideration by the Senate of the action by the Committee of the Whole;

(c) Consideration of other amendments; and finally

(d) Lying over for 1 day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct, with one caveat. After the Senate has completed the amendatory process on a treaty, the treaty does not have to lie over 1 day. The resolution of ratification cannot be presented until the next day, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I believe I predicated my question "if it is not with unanimous consent." Without unanimous consent that would not be the case; is that correct, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

In considering each treaty by articles, as the rules provides, with committee amendments, if any, to be considered first, would it not be necessary to consider amendments from the floor of the Senate as to an article and to have a vote on such article before amendments of any sort to the next succeeding article could be offered or considered in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments to the treaty are first considered article by article, but each article itself is not acted on. There is no vote on the article as such.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Chair kindly repeat that? I did not quite understand the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments to treaties are considered article by article, but each article itself is not acted on. There is no vote on the article as such.

Mr. ALLEN. But all amendments are considered; all amendments from the floor are considered before the Senate turns to the next succeeding article?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair. If Calendar No. 1—the Neutrality Treaty—is approved, and Calendar No. 2—the Panama Canal Treaty—is not approved by the Senate, would not the action on the Neutrality Treaty be thereby vitiated, since it is not to go into effect until the expiration of the term of Calendar No. 2, the Panama Canal Treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the precedents of the Senate, the Chair does not interpret the legal effect of Senate action. The Chair accordingly does not find it appropriate to answer the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair for his nonanswer to my inquiry.

For cloture to be invoked as to the treaties, would not a separate cloture motion and a separate cloture vote by at least 60 Senators on each motion be required?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator means that cloture will have to be invoked once on each treaty, he is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair. If cloture is sought on one treaty and voted by the Senate, would it not be necessary to complete action on the clotured treaty before there could be a cloture vote on the second treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. At what point will the preamble of the treaties be before the Senate for consideration and for possible amendment, and for action by the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are no preambles to the treaties as such. If the Senator refers to the declaration of the signatory powers as to their understanding and intent of the "Panama Canal Treaty" made at the time it was signed, the Chair would state that this in the past has been held by the Senate not to be part of the treaty and not subject to amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. In other words, the introductory language, then, could make any statement whatsoever and the Senate would have no right to review and correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. My answer would remain the same.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the "Documents Implementing the Panama Canal Treaty" and the "Other Documents" identified on page 221 of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Executive Report No. 95-12) be identified in like manner in the Record at this point as predicate for my next two parliamentary inquiries. I am sure the Chair is familiar with those.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the lists were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DOCUMENTS ASSOCIATED WITH THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

CONTENTS

Documents implementing the Panama Canal Treaty

Note Regarding Economic and Military Cooperation.

Exchange of Notes Relating to Air Traffic Control Services.

Note Regarding the Establishment of the Panama Bureau of the United States Foreign Broadcast Information Service.

Exchange of Notes Relating to Scientific Activities in Panama of the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute.

Exchange of Notes Relating to Custodianship of the Barro Colorado Native Monument by the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair. Since most of the actual agreements between the United States and Panama are provided in the documents set forth in the Record pursuant to the foregoing unanimous-consent request, are such documents before the Senate for consideration and for vote thereon, and for possible amendment prior thereto?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only the body of the treaty, including all of its articles, annexes thereto, protocols to it, et cetera, is before the Senate for consideration and therefore amendable.

The treaty before the Senate has two annexes and one protocol, which would fall into that category. The second treaty has one annex and 1 minute.

Mr. ALLEN. Anyway they would be amendable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Following the Chair's reasoning to its logical conclusion, then, it would be possible, in a treaty, to say that the United States and another country agreed to a treaty which is set forth in a separate agreement between the Presidents, and therefore the Senate would have no right to change that, shall I say, side agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate would, of course, have the choice to ratify it or not.

Mr. ALLEN. Have what?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The right to ratify it or not.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. But that would be a legitimate exercise of the treaty power, then, of the executive; is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Presiding Officer prefers not to rule on hypothetical questions.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for clarification?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator earlier asked that the documents in the Panama Canal Treaty and the earlier documents identified on page 221 of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations be included in the record as a predicate for his next two parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. ALLEN. Not the documents themselves, I say to the distinguished majority leader; merely the page I am referring to. I did not want to encumber the record.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator identify the pages again?

Mr. ALLEN. It is on page 221 of the Foreign Relations Committee report.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And going to what page?

Mr. ALLEN. Just the one page, the numbered items.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I see. So, then, according to the Chair's response, the texts of the treaties beginning on page 201—I am putting the response a bit differently—the texts of the treaties beginning on page 201 and ending on page 220, including the annexes, the protocols, and the single minute, would be in totality all that would be before the Senate for debate and amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator restate that?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. As I understand the Chair's answer to the question propounded by the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen), all that would be before the Senate for its consideration would not include the documents implementing the Panama Canal Treaties, but would only include the text of the treaties themselves, the annexes thereto, the protocol and the one minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

If amendments to a treaty or treaties inconsistent with the provisions of the documents set forth in the record pursuant to the foregoing unanimous consent request are agreed to by the Senate, would not such amendments so adopted supplant or supersede the inconsistent provisions of such documents?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Once again, the Senator is asking for an interpretation of the Senate's actions, which the Chair does not find it appropriate to indulge in.

Mr. ALLEN. Yet an amendment varying the terms of such other documents would be in order, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments to matters before the Senate are in order at the proper time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But amendments to "other documents," to use the Senator's phraseology, would not be appropriate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Chair has been very specific on that in response to an earlier inquiry.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I want to make sure I fully understand the ruling of the Chair and the inquiries by the majority leader and the Senator from Alabama.

It is my impression, then, that only those matters described in the committee report from page 201 to 220 are before the Senate and are available for action by the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

May I repeat that part of my earlier ruling that spells it out?

The treaty before the Senate has two annexes and one protocol, which are subject to amendment. The second treaty has one annex and one minute subject to amendment, and that minute was inadvertently left out of the committee's report.

The amendable portions of the treaty are described in the ruling just given.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the distinguished minority leader yield on this very point?

Mr. BAKER. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. While the Chair has stated that the minute was omitted from the Foreign Relations Committee report on the Panama Canal Treaties, actually, what is before the Senate is the document, the Panama Canal Treaties message from the President of the United States, September 16, 1977, 95th Congress, 1st session, Executive N, which does include the minute which was inadvertently left out of the committee's report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

Will the Senator from Alabama permit me one more clarifying question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. The effect of these statements, then, and the ruling of the Chair, as I understand it, is that those documents described on page 221 of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, under the heading, "Selected Documents" would not be available for action of the Senate, such as maps of the land and water areas for the operation and defense of the Panama Canal, and so on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If they are not within the material that was earlier listed in my ruling, they would not be subject to amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for one inquiry?

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the Chair, has the Senator from Alabama, then, inquired as to the status of the agreement and implementation of article III of the Panama Canal Treaty that appears on page 223 of the committee documents, what the status of that is as far as the Senate is concerned?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a matter before the Senate for consideration. I, of course, would not be in a position to respond to what the status is.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for his clarifying inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I say to the distinguished Senator from Alaska that the effect of the ruling is that most of the provisions having to do with the implementation of the canal treaties are an untouchable document. It just lies over there in limbo, so to speak, but cannot be touched by the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I must respectfully state that I do not agree with the distinguished Senator in his last statement. They could be dealt with by reservations and understandings when the resolution of ratification is presented and, in addition, when the implementing legislation is before the House and the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that point.

I say to the distinguished majority leader that I had previously asked the Chair if amendments to the treaty might be offered that would be inconsistent with these provisions and would they not supplant those provisions. He declined to answer.

Certainly, amendments embodying provisions at variance with these other documents would be in order, just as the Senator points out, reservations and understandings.

The point the Senator from Alabama is making is that the agreements themselves are not subject to amendment, under the response of the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, Executive N contains in the case of the Panama Canal Treaty an annex and an agreed minute. Additionally, the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal, also within Executive N, has two annexes each having a map attachment. At what point will the annexes, minutes, and associated attachments within Executive N be before the Committee of the Whole for consideration and possible amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The two annexes and one protocol to the first treaty, and the one annex and one minute to the second treaty, will be before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole in sequence after the articles of each treaty have been considered for amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

My next question has already been answered by the Chair, having to do with amendments offered to the treaties that might supplant the provisions of the other document. He has already responded to that.

Subject to the limitations that might be imposed by cloture, Mr. President, are not each article and each amendment to an article debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Are not amendments offered to a treaty amendable in like manner as amendments to bills in legislative session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Are perfecting amendments to portions of the treaty sought to be amended in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. If I may respond further, the treaty is amendable in two degrees.

Mr. ALLEN. Did the Chair complete its ruling?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. The answer is "Yes," the treaty is amendable in two degrees.

Mr. ALLEN. In like manner as a bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, In the absence of cloture, must amendments to articles be germane to the article under consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, unless cloture is invoked there is no rule of germaneness.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Since both the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal are made in duplicate, in English and Spanish languages, both texts being declared equally authentic, are the Spanish texts of both treaties before the Senate for consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, under the precedents, only the English text is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. What assurance then would the Senate have that the document in Spanish corresponded to the treaty as finally agreed to or to which the advice and consent of the Senate is given?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only treaty being recommended for ratification by the Senate is that before us in English.

Mr. ALLEN. I will not argue with the Chair on that point, only to point out a number of discrepancies and different meanings are set forth in the Spanish text from the understanding of the English language.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is it not true that the Senate often has treaties before it for giving of its advice and consent for ratification thereof which are in various languages and in every case it is only the English text that is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia is correct. This is a long-standing precedent and tradition of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I might say, parenthetically, we had some trouble with interpretations of the English language and I was just wondering who would interpret, who would put into Spanish the wording of the English treaty as completed here in the Senate.

I might inquire if Mr. Torrijos possibly might be the interpreter? I say that parenthetically, and I do not ask for a ruling on the question.

If they are not both before the Senate, when will the Spanish language texts be presented to the Senate; when, if at all, will the Spanish language texts be presented to the Senate for consideration and comparison with the English language texts for the purpose of ascertaining any discrepancies between them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Again, under the precedents, the Spanish language texts will not be before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

One final question: If the President transmits two treaties to the Senate under cover of one message and the same are received by the Senate and docketed as one executive message, if no action is taken in committee to change the manner in which the documents were transmitted, would not such documents remain in the order transmitted when reported by the committee to the Senate for consideration in the Committee of the Whole? In other words, is not really the Panama Canal Treaty before the Senate rather than the Neutrality Treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will propound the additional question, then I will answer it?

Mr. ALLEN. I ask: In other words, is not the Panama Canal Treaty rather than the Treaty on Neutrality, the treaty that should properly be before the Senate at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reporting committee can determine the sequence in which they are placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ALLEN. Even though they were submitted by the President in the reverse order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the position of the Presiding Officer. For example, the committee need not report them at all.

Mr. ALLEN. I might state that I agree with the President on his order of presentation of these treaties to the Senate, and I hope that in time we will have an opportunity to consider first the Panama Canal Treaty, because I do not believe we should be considering what takes place in the year 2000 before we decide whether or not the canal shall be given away. But I think there will be an appropriate time when that motion can be made, and I might say to the distinguished majority leader, I feel that even if we are proceeding now on the Neutrality Treaty we have lost no time, there will be no lost motion if the Senate should move to proceed to the Panama Canal Treaty first because I understand that only general opening speeches will be made at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I understand we will reserve until after the nonlegislative day period his making the motion to proceed to the Panama Canal Treaty in preference to the Neutrality Treaty, which is presently before the Senate.

I think I should compliment the Committee on Foreign Relations at this time for its having reported out first the Neutrality Treaty. I think that that treaty contains questions which Senators would want to have answered before they vote on the Panama Canal Treaty. In other words, I do not think that Senators would want to vote to relinquish control of the Panama Canal after the year 2000 without first being assured that our war vessels and auxiliary vessels would indeed go to the head of the line in the case of need or emergency and without first also being assured that there is no question about the right of the United States after the year 2000 once it has relinquished control of the canal to act against any aggression or any action that would impair the open access or impede the use of the canal.

So I think that was the rationale for the committee's action. I think it was appropriate and I would hope that the Senate would support the committee and the joint leadership at such time as that motion is made.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and in that capacity and also as one of the joint leadership I join with Senator Byrd in not only requesting that the Foreign Relations Committee consider reporting treaties in this manner and in this sequence for the reasons that the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has enumerated, but for another and very personal reason to me—that is my previous announcement that unless the Neutrality Treaty is amended in certain respects I would not find it possible to support the Panama Canal Treaty. So for my part, at least, I wanted to see that issue resolved before we proceed to the question of the Panama Canal Treaty itself.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment, please?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I would like to express my appreciation to the Chair for his response to these questions. I believe that it does set a framework for proper and expeditious, I might say, consideration of the treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I thank the Senator from Alabama, particularly for propounding his questions in writing in advance.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Alabama. Someone asked me once, "Don't you wish you knew the rules as well as the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama?" And I guess I do. But I never cease to be amazed and gratified by his grasp of not only the rules themselves and the precedents of the Senate, but his feel for the totality of our procedure; and I think he has contributed immeasurably to the orderliness of our procedure.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would like at this time, if I may, to make a request on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin). It has been called to my attention that the committee report which contains, of course, his minority views, has rather extensive typographical errors. I believe that this has been cleared with the majority leader. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that there be a star print of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations carrying the corrections.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator qualify his request by simply asking for a star print of the views of Mr. Griffin? I think this would constitute a considerable saving of taxpayer money.

Mr. BAKER. I think not only will it constitute a savings but I think the Senator from Michigan would prefer that procedure. As a matter of fact, he originally had requested that his views might be printed separately.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In any event I say to the leader that would be satisfactory to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I revise my request so that there may be a star print separately bound of the views of the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I am now informed that there are also errors in the committee report aside from the errors in the reported views of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, so I withdraw my suggestion that I earlier made to the distinguished minority leader and ask that the entire report be reissued as a star print.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that is fine.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I say that is correct, and I am just on my feet to make that request.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the Chair will suggest that the omitted minute be added to that report as well.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I revise my request to include the omitted minute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Two other housekeeping matters. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that Allison Rosenberg of Mr. Percy's staff and Caroline Randel of Senator Hansen's staff may have privileges of the floor during consideration of these.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. John Napier, of the Judiciary staff; Mr. Ed Kenney and Ken Fish, of the Armed Services staff, be granted privilege of the floor during consideration and voting on these treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. I make the same request, Mr. President, in respect to Michael Kraft of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, the same request for Martin James of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. CANNON. The same request for Frank Krebs of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY, Mr. President, I ask the same request for Marty Franks and Robert Paguin, of my staff, throughout deliberations and voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I make the same request on behalf of the following: Dr. John Bacher and Tom Carter of Senator Hayakawa's staff, Bob Turner of Senator Griffin's staff, Steve Perles of Senator Stevens' staff, Mark Edelman of Senator Danforth's staff, Margaret Lynch and Sylvia Castellanos of Senator McClure's staff, Peter Lakeland of Senator Javits' staff, Bob Downen of Senator Dole's staff. Al Dreschler and Margo Carlisle of my own staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I make the same request for Clifford Hackett of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the following staff members of the Committee on Foreign Relations be granted privilege of the floor throughout the debate on the two Panama Canal treaties: Norvill Jones, Robert Dockery, George W. Ashworth, Robert Barton, Michael Glennon, Ralph McMurphy, Joel Johnson and Ralph Nurnberger; and Bruce Van Voorst, of Senator Clark's office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the same request for Ira Nordlicht of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that David LaRoche, of my staff, be granted privilege of the floor during discussions of the treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, the same request for Jane Mathias, of Senator Ford's staff, and Carolyn Fuller, of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to my namesake, the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, the same request for Jack F. Davis, of my staff, and Christopher Lehman, of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I make the same request on behalf of Senator Hatch for Dr. Jim McClellan, and on behalf of myself for Dr. James P. Lucier.

I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

As I understand it, we have introduced amendments 20 and 21. I guess, any time prior to the consideration of those amendments, that cosponsors will be accepted.

I only point out that it is like cosponsoring one's own amendment since they are very much like amendments 7 and 8 of the Senator from Kansas' proposed language.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Kansas is to be complimented for his leadership in this matter.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, the same request for Mark Lubbers of my staff.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in order that we might have room for Senators here in the Chamber while this debate is going on. I make no request for assistants whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that various requests that have been propounded and agreed to not interrupt in the Record the Chair's responses to parliamentary inquiries, first, from the Senator from Alabama, the very distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen), and now from myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, would not cloture, if invoked on a treaty, be effective throughout the entire deliberations—including Committee of the Whole, actions in the Senate, and covering the resolution of ratification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia is advised that cloture if invoked on a treaty, pertains to all aspects of the treaty, the Committee of the Whole and action on both the treaty and the resolution of ratification.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, is a reservation, declaration, or understanding to the resolution of ratification considered to be an amendment in the first degree?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; a reservation, declaration, or understanding is amendable in one degree.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, once the Senate concurs in an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole, the amended language would not then be open to further amendment, would it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The amended language would not then be open for further amendment.

Mr. SCOTT addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But prior to the concurrence of the Senate to the amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole, perfecting amendments to that amendment and substitute amendments to that amendment would be in order, would they not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield briefly for clarification?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I would pose the question that after the consideration of the treaty, as in the Committee of the Whole, the treaty will be before the Senate for consideration, and amendments can be offered at that time which have not been offered when considered as the Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct, as was pointed out by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. When the distinguished majority leader spoke of the reservation, I assume he meant reservations to the treaty, rather than to the resolution of ratification, did he not?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No, no, no, because I referred to the reservations, the resolutions of ratification only.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

May I then propound an inquiry?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May I say that it is my understanding no reservations can be offered to the treaty. Amendments are offered to the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Reservations are offered to the resolution of ratification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. But a clarifying inquiry, though, obviously, a reservation to the resolution of ratification could not be offered until it had been presented to the Senate after the procedure that has been outlined heretofore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. Reservations are not in order until after the presentation of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, when the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole are reported to the Senate, is an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole considered to be an amendment in the first degree even though it may have been a second degree amendment in the Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. It is considered an amendment in the first degree.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, once the resolution of ratification has been presented to the Senate for consideration, if it contains amendments to the treaty previously adopted, is that part of the resolution of ratification open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, it is not.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, are any amendments to a treaty in order after the resolution of ratification has been presented to the Senate for action, that is, after all decisions on amending a treaty shall have been reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification and presented to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. Once the resolution of ratification has been presented, amendments to the treaty are no longer in order.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. That would not preclude reservations which are presented at the time the resolution of ratification is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Amendments, no; the reservations, yes. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, after the amending process of a treaty "as in the Committee of the Whole" has been completed, what is the procedure for reporting the treaty back to the Senate?

In the House, when the House resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole, the Speaker steps down from the chair and a Member of the House takes the chair, to preside during the Committee of the Whole; and when the Committee of the Whole rises, the appointed Representative goes down from the chair, the Speaker reassumes his position, and the Member who presided over the Committee of the Whole then reports to the Speaker as to the consequences of the actions of the Committee of the Whole.

In the Senate, what is the procedure for reporting the treaty back to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate does not technically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, but it does, under the rules, consider the treaty as in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore, it is reported back by the Chair, who states this question: "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in the Committee of the Whole?"

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, would a proposed reservation, regardless of the subject matter, be subject to a point of order as not being in fact a reservation but an amendment, in reality, to the treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the past, this question has always been submitted to the Senate for its decision ab initio, and the Senate has decided that such a point of order will lie if the proposed reservation is really in fact an amendment of the treaty. But the decision is for the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have one final question at this point.

When a treaty is being considered as in the Committee of the Whole for amendments, is it in order to offer an amendment that would amend more than one article of the treaty, or must an amendment be confined to the article that has been before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is only in order to offer an amendment to the article then pending before the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I merely wish to reassert the Chair's ruling that the amendment does not have to be germane. One could not seek to amend article I by also amending articles II and III. But if one makes no reference to the other articles, it would be in order, inasmuch as there would be no rule of germaneness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. Unless cloture is invoked.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. My question was that the same amendment cannot go to two articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I express my gratitude to the Chair, the distinguished Vice President of the United States, for assuming the Chair at this time, in recognition of his constitutional duty to preside over the Senate and at a time when it is important that these guidelines be clearly made a part of the record, in view of the additional fact that we are about to proceed on a very historic debate; and I express my personal thanks to him for the excellent responses to the parliamentary inquiries.

I also thank the distinguished Senator from Alabama for the thoughtfulness and foresight he has demonstrated, which is characteristic of him, and for his service in presenting the parliamentary inquiries which will help to guide us all in our deliberations in the days ahead.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, in the hearings before the Armed Services Committee on the economic aspects concerning the canal, witnesses testified that treaty implementing legislation is the key determinant of the financial viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission and thus the determinant as to whether there is or is not any burden on the American taxpayer.

My question is this: If implementing legislation is not considered by Congress prior to the ratification of the proposed treaties, would such implementing legislation have any legal effect, binding effect, on the treaties themselves?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the traditions of the Senate, the Presiding Officer does not interpret or render a legal opinion, and I therefore must refrain from responding to the question.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I think it only fair to all Senators to state at this time that the joint leadership would expect the Senate to be engaged in the debate and consideration of these treaties for a period of several weeks. I hope that final action can occur within 4 or 5 weeks. But, at best, it is going to be necessary for Senators to be on the floor as much as possible, to listen to the debates, and to be prepared to address their remarks to the treaties.

National Public Radio is reporting the developments of the debate. It will do so from the beginning of the debate until 5 o'clock in the afternoon, at the time of the presentation of the news. I believe that for the first 2 or 3 days of this week, it may be that National Public Radio will be going from gavel-to-gavel and will not be cutting off the audio transmission of the debate at 5 o'clock. Later in the evening there will be a condensation of the developments of the day by National Public Radio, and the networks will be feeding off audio feeds from those audio transmissions that are emanating throughout the country by National Public Radio.

What I am saying is this: If we chew up a lot of time in quorum calls, this is not accommodating the public; because it is for the purpose of informing the public as to the pros and cons of these treaties that the Senate has consented for the first time to audio transmission of the debates. Moreover, it will delay the Senate in its final action. It is hoped that Senators will be here on the floor and will be ready to make their statements.

For these reasons, the minority leader and I have come to the conclusion, based on our conversations with members of the committee and other Members, that during the debates on these treaties, it will be difficult to secure consent for committees to meet during the session of the Senate, except to deal with circumstances of an emergency nature. Of course, committees, under the Standing Rules, have the first 2 hours of the Senate session to meet without consent, and they can meet before the Senate goes into session.

I ask my distinguished friend, the minority leader, if he joins me in adjuring Senators to be on the floor as much as possible, alerting committee chairmen and subcommittee chairmen to the necessity of objecting to requests for meetings of committees and subcommittees while this historic debate is underway.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the majority leader is entirely right, and I fully agree with him.

As I advised him earlier in private conversation, I told the regular weekly Republican policy luncheon yesterday, that it was my purpose to object to all except the most extraordinary requests for committees to meet during the session of the Senate. Not only is it necessary in terms of the importance and the divisiveness of this debate but also because there will be many times when committees might otherwise be engaged in consideration of matters that would cause a real problem for Members of the Senate. Committees might be considering something of extraordinary importance that should not take Members away from this floor.

So I served notice yesterday—and I reiterate today—that I will view carefully any request for committees to meet during the session of the Senate, and I intend to object to all except the most remarkable ones.

I point this out to the majority leader, also: We may have a problem with respect to staff members on the floor. I just asked the desk to give me a compilation of the unanimous-consent requests that already have been entered, and there are 44 staff members in addition to the 50 or 55 that ordinarily have access to the floor. Now there are going to be more staff than Senators.

I do not know how we can address that problem, but I say to my friend and colleague, the majority leader, that I think we have a real problem. I believe we should give some thought to how we can thin out the ranks of staff during the course of this debate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I say to the minority leader, in response to that question, that the Sergeant at Arms, I believe, ordinarily attempts to rotate staff people to the extent that if there are more than can be accommodated in the seating arrangement at the rear of the Chamber, some are asked to go to the gallery to which I am pointing, which has been set aside for staff.

The minority leader has raised an important and pertinent question, and we will have to deal with that if it gets to be a problem.

I promised my distinguished senior colleague to say that during today and tomorrow and Friday, it is hoped that the Senate will, for the most part, be engaging in debate on the treaties. This does not mean that a Senator cannot make a motion or cannot offer an amendment to the first article; and, of course, motions to table would be in order. There possibly could be rollcall votes.

However, insofar as the treaties are concerned—I have discussed this with Senator Allen and others—I believe that it would be the general feeling of Members that if we could confine these 3 days to the opening debates, with an understanding that no Senator is being deprived of his rights, we might anticipate debate only on the treaties.

This does not mean that following the debate on the first treaty on a given day there might not be a conference report that could be called up, either preceding or following the debate, and that a rollcall vote might occur on that conference report. But as to the treaties themselves, I say to my senior colleague that I am disposed to urge that we confine our activities to the debate on the treaties rather than to votes in regard thereto.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. I think that is a good arrangement, and I fully subscribe to it.

On the question of staff, I think the only thing we can or should do at this point is to urge that we use care and some discretion as to when we bring staff to the floor. Otherwise, we are going to be inundated with staff members.

I would add one other thing: These two seats in the center aisle in the front row are historic seats and traditionally belong to the majority leader and the minority leader. It implies in most cases that there is a difference of opinion between these two seats.

So I advise the majority leader that, except as to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. Case), who is the ranking and senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, during the presentation of his statement, I have invited those who oppose the treaties to take this place, so that they can conduct their opposition from this position.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have asked the distinguished chairman of the committee to sit in the chair which is normally held by the majority leader but which also customarily is relinquished to the managers of bills and treaties. I hope the chairman will accept my invitation to take that chair throughout the deliberation on the treaties.

Ordinarily, I am not on the minority side of the aisle, as I am now; so I ask the pardon of the members of the minority for my intruding on their side of the aisle.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished majority leader on his statements as to the conduct of the debate. I certainly approve and endorse his suggestion that Senators be on the floor not only to listen to the debate but also to be prepared to participate in the debate.

And I hope that it will not be necessary to make a single request for a quorum call. I believe it is possible to go through an entire day without this frequently used device being resorted to. I believe that, if Senators are attentive to the debate and are here to participate in the debate, it will not be necessary to have a quorum call.

The distinguished majority leader has said that he is hopeful that we can complete action on the treaties in some point of time up to 5 weeks. I would hope that we will be able to dispose of the treaties before then.

I anticipate no filibuster, I say to the distinguished majority leader. That does not mean that the issue will not be fully and carefully discussed and the whole issue brought before the Senate and before the American people. But I do believe that the people want a vote on this issue.

I do not believe that the public opinion would support and I do not believe that any overly extended debate will be successful unless it does have the backing of the people. I do not believe the people want this issue decided by an over-extension of debate.

So certainly, as far as the Senator from Alabama and those of like mind here in the Senate in opposition to these treaties, we do not intend to delay unduly the consideration of these treaties. We do not expect to delay it by quorum calls or unnecessary delays of any sort. We are not going to have debates, as far as the Senator from Alabama is concerned, by delay. We are going to try to consider the merits and demerits of these and have votes on substantive amendments and then I feel that we will be ready to vote on the main issue. But there are a number, I would say in the nature of dozens, of substantive amendments that should be discussed and should be brought before the Senate and should be brought before the country, because this is an issue that is so important to the entire country and all of the people of the United States.

So I am hopeful we can have a full and free debate but that debate not extend beyond the point where the full issue is presented to the Senate so that action can then be taken.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

I also wish to thank the chairman and the ranking minority member for their indulgence in allowing us to proceed before they make their opening statement.

They have been courteous and thoughtful as is customary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, first let me say I want to express my appreciation to the majority leader and to the minority leader for the very fine manner in which they have cooperated with the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of course, Senator Baker is a member of the committee himself and he participated in all of the hearings and the voting and performed a wonderful job.

Senator Byrd appeared before our committee, testified forcefully, and was very helpful to us in our considerations.

I have a statement that I want to present as the opening statement in this debate.

Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported favorably the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal with recommendations to each. The committee reached its decision after long and careful consideration of the issues and the viewpoints of all concerned. I have no hesitation in recommending strongly that the Senate give its advice and consent to these treaties as reported by the committee.

Prior to reaching a decision on the treaties, the Committee on Foreign Relations held 15 days of hearings and heard 92 witnesses including 17 Members of the Congress, representatives of the executive branch, shipping interests and canal users and retired military officers. These hearings were conducted with the goal of gaining as much information and as many views as possible. Every effort was made to allow individuals with different positions to present their cases. I am proud of what I think was fair and objective consideration of the real issues, the dedication and hard work exhibited by the members of the committee and the harmony with which our consideration was conducted. I do not know how such an important proceeding could have been conducted more equitably.

In addition to the numerous hearings held by the committee, 10 members of the committee traveled to Panama and the canal in recent months. These committee members, and others in the Senate including our distinguished majority and minority leaders went to Panama to gain firsthand knowledge about the canal, its future and our relations with Panama.

I was in Panama last month, and I returned impressed by the basic goodwill of the Government and people of Panama toward the United States. I feel that when problems that have festered for many years are resolved by the ratification of these treaties, the United States and Panama will be able to cooperate well in operating and protecting the canal in their mutual interest.

Five volumes of hearings and an extensive report have been issued by the committee in connection with these treaties. I urge every Member of the Senate to review this information, but especially the committee's report. We considered and discussed the issues raised by those in opposition to the treaties, and the report details the committee's determinations on these issues and responses to them. However, I would like briefly to outline the major questions the committee examined.

First, the committee considered the need for a new treaty relationship with Panama to govern the operation of the Panama Canal. The committee was convinced that the surest way to place our position in Panama and in Latin America and the canal itself in jeopardy was to cling blindly to the 1903 Treaty.

The 1903 treaty was negotiated and ratified under circumstances that could be called questionable at best. The treaty was negotiated and signed for Panama by a Frenchman more interested in the welfare of the French Canal Co., of which he was a major stockholder, than in the newly formed Republic of Panama. When the Panamanians objected to the treaty, the threat of withdrawal of the U.S. military presence left them no choice but to ratify.

Since 1903, the treaty relationship and especially the U.S. control over the Canal Zone has been a constant source of conflict. As Secretary of State Hay said in a letter to Senator Spooner, the 1903 treaty is—Vastly advantageous to the United States, and we must confess, with what face we can muster, not so advantageous to Panama * * * you and I know too well how many points there are to which a Panamanian patriot could object.

The objections by Panamanians have not since decreased, but, instead, have intensified. The objections have been presented to the United States on countless occasions, to international bodies and, tragically, in demonstrations resulting in the death of United States and Panamanian citizens. It is inconceivable when looking at this record that the United States can reasonably hope to cling to the 1903 treaty and also maintain the cooperative environment essential to the operation of the canal.

Mr. President, I should like to interject right here that I have recently read two very interesting books on the Panama Canal. One was entitled "The Patch Between the Seas." The other was "The Story of the Panama Canal."

I found them both interesting. But there was one thing pointed out in these books with which I was absolutely amazed, and that was the number of treaties there have been involving the Panama Canal and its precincts. The history goes way back to the DeLesseps Co. of France and its arrangement with Colombia. There were even efforts and treaties long before that. It has been a long, long trail.

(Mr. SARBANES assumed the chair.)

Mr. SPARKMAN. The outdated Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 not only seriously hinders an effective relationship with Panama, but it is a major problem in our long term relationships with the other Latin American and third world nations. Even nations that have been our traditional allies recognize that the 1903 Treaty has no place in the modern world. When the U.N. Security Council met on the Panama Canal issue in 1973, the best the United States could do was to get Great Britain to abstain while the United States vetoed a resolution critical of the continuation of the 1903 Treaty.

During the committee's hearings, even the most vocal critics of the proposed treaties did not contend that the 1903 Treaty should govern canal operation into the future without some modification. The Committee on Foreign Relations agrees that modification is necessary, and has determined that the treaties under consideration offer the best solution that could be negotiated to deal with our difficulties with the 1903 Treaty.

The committee would like to make it clear that regardless of the questionable circumstances surrounding the negotiation and ratification of the 1903 Treaty, the United States has no reason to apologize for the manner in which it constructed and has operated the canal. The canal is truly a wonder of science and engineering. I am particularly proud of the great contribution in the area of disease control made by my fellow Alabamian, Col. William Crawford Gorgas. Without his work in the control of tropical diseases, the canal might not have been built, or the death toll would have been many times higher. Not only did the United States succeed in conquering the engineering and health problems, but we have compiled an admirable record in operating the canal as an international public utility at the lowest possible rates.

I may say that we take pride in the work done in connection with the laying out, the engineering, the construction of the canal in addition to the fine work that I mentioned done by Dr. Gorgas.

Next, the committee asked what was the most important interest of the United States in the canal and answered that use by our naval vessels and commercial shipping was the most critical interest of the United States. Use of the canal, and not ownership of the canal or jurisdiction over the Canal Zone, far outweighs any claims of sovereignty. Repeatedly during our hearings this view was stressed by military leaders and witnesses from the Departments of Transportation and Commerce who are directly concerned with naval and commercial traffic through the canal. Secretary of Defense Brown said:

The first requirement includes free and unimpeded use of the Canal both by our Navy and by our merchant ships. Free use of the Canal is essential to assure optimum ability to shift our forces and materiel rapidly between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

General Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, added:

U.S. military interests in the Panama Canal are in its use, not its ownership.

After addressing the question of our major interest in the canal, the committee turned to the issue of how this interest could best be protected. The committee found that the long-term interest of the United States would be ill-served by maintenance of the present badly outdated treaty of 1903 since that treaty has been the cause of rancor ever since it went into effect. We must face the fact that the Panama Canal lies right in the middle of another nation, and logic compels us to realize that a cooperative environment in that nation is far more beneficial than an arrangement that has already cause violence on several occasions. Under the proposed treaty relationship, Panama will have a greater stake in the canal, and, thus, a greater interest in seeing that it remains open for the use of the ships of the United States and the world.

Secretary of Defense Brown said during the committee's hearings:

Whether or not we will have that use depends on a good many things. It depends upon whether in extremes we have a military force capable of assuring that it is kept open, but it also depends importantly on the attitudes of the Panamanians. It is easy to damage a lock so that the Canal's operation is shut down for a brief period. It is easy to do that over and over again. What do we want? Do we want a situation where we may have to use force over and over and over again in order to preserve the operability of the Canal or do we want a situation where the people of Panama see themselves correctly as having an important stake in keeping the Canal operating? Well, clearly the latter is the preferable situation.

The committee believes the proposed treaties represent the best agreements obtainable; that they were carefully negotiated; and that they will protect our interest in the use of the canal.

Mr. President, I should like here to pay a compliment to our two chief negotiators of these treaties, Ambassador Bunker and Ambassador Linowitz. We heard from them at length. We felt that they had done a remarkably good job in negotiating these treaties.

The committee then considered the ability of the United States to take action to defend the canal should the need occur. Until the year 2000, the United States clearly has the primary responsibility for canal defense, and the Panama Canal Treaty provides for these defense responsibilities. However, the committee looked at the long range defense question as it will be affected by the neutrality treaty. The committee is confident that the Neutrality Treaty, as clarified by the joint statement issued by President Carter and General Torrijos and the committee's recommended amendment based on this statement, provides ample authority for the United States to act to protect its interest in the use of the canal. Also, our interest in priority use of the canal during times of need of emergency is fully protected.

Charges that the United States will be giving away the canal and the taxpayers will be paying Panama to take it were examined by the committee. The committee does not believe that such is the case. All annuity payments to Panama will come from canal operating revenues and not from the tax dollars of Americans.

The increased payments reflect, at last, adequate compensation to Panama for the use of its territory and natural resources, especially water.

It takes 52 million gallons of fresh water to send just one ship through the canal. With over 13,000 transits per year at present and many more than that by 2000, it should be easy to see that Panama contributes much to the successful operation of the canal.

The payments to Panama will aid in the maintenance of a progressive, free enterprise economy in Panama, which will contribute to Panama's ability to cooperate in operating the canal. The payments, also, will be a major incentive to Panama to see that the canal remains open and operates efficiently.

The committee also wanted to know the effects of these treaties on the economy of the United States. Our findings are that the treaties and the toll increase of approximately 30 percent that will be necessary will have a negligible effect on the U.S. economy. A 30 percent increase in tolls will have a very minimal influence in the cost of goods shipped through the canal. The U.S. merchant fleet will not be placed at a further disadvantage, since all ships will pay the same tolls. The canal will retain its advantageous position in comparison to alternative routes or methods of shipment.

Along with our interest in the use of the canal goes an interest in seeing that it is operated effectively. The Panama Canal Treaty fully provides for effectiveness through the transition period leading to operation of the canal by Panama in the year 2000. During this period of over 20 years, the United States will continue to operate the canal through the Panama Canal Commission to be established as an agency of the U.S. Government, and the necessary rights and authority for U.S. operation are provided. Secretary of the Army Alexander assured the committee that:

In short, Mr. Chairman, the Treaty will provide us with all the rights necessary to adequately care for both the Panamanian and U.S. citizens of our dedicated work force.

Mr. Chairman, under the Treaty we would retain all the specific rights necessary to efficiently operate the Canal and adequately care for our employees.

Until sufficient numbers of Panamanians can be trained to assume the operation of the canal in 2000, and possibly after that date, American employees will be needed. As noted by Secretary Alexander in the statement I just quoted, the treaties provide the rights necessary to care for the American employees.

Although some workers will be displaced; efforts will be made to retain workers in their positions, preference will be given for other U.S. Government jobs to those displaced and early optional retirement will be provided. For those Americans who will be employed by the Commission or our Armed Forces, adequate housing and appropriate health and educational facilities will be available. In addition, these employees and their dependents will be covered by status of forces type agreements to protect their interests.

After our lengthy and close examination of the foregoing points and others directly related to the treaties at hand, the Committee on Foreign Relations has concluded that the treaties meet the needs of the United States and that the Senate should give its advice and consent to their ratification with the recommendations reported by the committee.

Now, I would like to comment on some basic principles the committee used in its scrutiny of these treaties which I hope the Senate will also recognize.

These treaties will not resolve every issue in the relations between the United States and Panama such as human rights, Panama's relations with Cuba, the internal policies of Panama or the form of Panama's government. The treaties were not negotiated for these purposes, and it would be illogical to expect that any treaty could accomplish such a broad program, or that it should be expected to do so.

The committee did not focus its attention on extraneous issues or nonissues; and I feel the Senate would be making a serious mistake if it allowed itself to get bogged down in useless debate on matters not directly related to the real purpose of the treaties. The Senate could debate for days issues such as what sovereign interest the United States has in the Canal Zone; but debate of this type would add little to what must be a political decision of whether these treaties best serve the long-term interests of the United States.

No treaty arrangement to govern the operation of the canal could possibly remove every doubt or deal with every contingency. Our consideration of the treaties must not become confused by "what if's" or "may be's." The committee has determined that the treaties represent a workable, specific structure for future canal operations and defense with sufficient latitude to deal with changed circumstances or contingencies that may develop.

I am confident that my colleagues will join in meaningful and responsible consideration of these important treaties and that the Senate's final decision will be based on rational analysis of the interests of the United States.

At this point, I would like to say again that I am proud of the work done by the Committee on Foreign Relations and of the manner in which the Panama Canal treaties were handled. I sincerely thank all the members of the committee, and especially Senator Case, the ranking minority member, Senator Church, the ranking majority member, and Senator Sarbanes, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, for their splendid cooperation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the treaties and integral related documents, excerpts from the committee report, and certain other relevant materials be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I conclude simply with this statement. I presume it is known that after the committee spent all of this time in getting all of the evidence, hearing from all of the people interested in the canal treaties, and considering all the arguments pro and con, the committee voted 14 to 1 to report the treaties. I will say this, Mr. President it is recognized, of course, that treaties come under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee regardless of what other reports or what other information may come out.

I. PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama.

Acting in the spirit of the Joint Declaration of April 3, 1964, by the Representatives of the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, and of the Joint Statement of Principles of February 7, 1974, initialed by the Secretary of State of the United States of America and the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Panama, and Acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory.

Have decided to terminate the prior Treaties pertaining to the Panama Canal and to conclude a new Treaty to serve as the basis for a new relationship between them and, accordingly, have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

ABROGATION OF PRIOR TREATIES AND ESTABLISHMENT OF A NEW RELATIONSHIP

1. Upon its entry into force, this Treaty terminates and supersedes:

(a) The Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, signed at Washington, November 18, 1903;

(b) The Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation signed at Washington, March 2, 1936, and the Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation and the related Memorandum of Understandings Reached, signed at Panama, January 25, 1955, between the United States of America and the Republic

(c) All other treaties, conventions, agreements and exchanges of notes between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, concerning the Panama Canal which were in force prior to the entry into force of this Treaty; and

(d) Provisions concerning the Panama Canal which appear in other treaties, conventions, agreements and exchanges of notes between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama which were in force prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

2. In accordance with the terms of this Treaty and related agreements, the Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America, for the duration of this Treaty, the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the Canal. The Republic of Panama guarantees to the United States of America the peaceful use of the land and water areas which it has been granted the rights to use for such purposes pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements.

3. The Republic of Panama shall participate increasingly in the management and protection and defense of the Canal, as provided in this Treaty.

4. In view of the special relationship established by this Treaty, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall cooperate to assure the uninterrupted and efficient operation of the Panama Canal.

ARTICLE II

RATIFICATION, ENTRY INTO FORCE, AND TERMINATION

1. This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

2. This Treaty shall terminate at noon, Panama time, December 31, 1999.

ARTICLE III

CANAL OPERATION AND MANAGEMENT

1. The Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America the rights to manage, operate, and maintain the Panama Canal, its complementary works, installations and equipment and to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Panama Canal. The United States of America accepts the grant of such rights and undertakes to exercise them in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

2. In carrying out the foregoing responsibilities, the United States of America may:

(a) Use for the aforementioned purposes, without cost except as provided in this Treaty, the various installations and areas (including the Panama Canal) and waters, described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date, as well as such other areas and installations as are made available to the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements, and take the measures necessary to ensure sanitation of such areas;

(b) Make such improvements and alterations to the aforesaid installations and areas as it deems appropriate, consistent with the terms of this Treaty;

(c) Make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules;

(d) Establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment;

(e) Regulate relations with employees of the United States Government;

(f) Provide supporting services to facilitate the performance of its responsibilities under this Article;

(g) Issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of the rights and responsibilities of the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules; and

(h) Exercise any other right granted under this Treaty, or otherwise agreed upon between the two Parties.

3. Pursuant to the foregoing grant of rights, the United States of America shall, in accordance with the terms of this Treaty and the provisions of United States law, carry out its responsibilities by means of a United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America.

(a) The Panama Canal Commission shall be supervised by a Board composed of nine members, five of whom shall be nationals of the United States of America, and four of whom shall be Panamanian nationals proposed by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America in a timely manner.

(b) Should the Republic of Panama request the United States of America to remove a Panamanian national from membership on the Board, the United States of America shall agree to such a request. In that event, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America to such position in a timely manner. In case of removal of a Panamanian member of the Board at the initiative of the United States of America, both Parties will consult in advance in order to reach agreement concerning such removal, and the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America in his stead.

(c) The United States of America shall employ a national of the United States of America as Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission, and a Panamanian national as Deputy Administrator, through December 31, 1989. Beginning January 1, 1990, a Panamanian national shall be employed as the Administrator and a national of the United States of America shall occupy the position of Deputy Administrator. Such Panamanian nationals shall be proposed to the United States of America by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America.

(d) Should the United States of America remove the Panamanian national from his position as Deputy Administrator, or Administrator, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment to such position by the United States of America.

4. An illustrative description of the activities the Panama Canal Commission will perform in carrying out the responsibilities and rights of the United States of America under this Article is set forth at the Annex. Also set forth in the Annex are procedures for the discontinuance or transfer of those activities performed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty by the Panama Canal Company or the Canal Zone Government which are not to be carried out by the Panama Canal Commission.

5. The Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama for the costs incurred by the Republic of Panama in providing the following public services in the Canal operating areas and in housing areas set forth in the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty and occupied by both United States and Panamanian citizen employees of the Panama Canal Commission: police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection. The Panama Canal Commission shall pay the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per annum for the foregoing services. It is agreed that every three years from the date that this Treaty enters into force, the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services.

6. The Republic of Panama shall be responsible for providing, in all areas comprising the former Canal Zone, services of a general jurisdictional nature such as customs and immigration, postal services, courts and licensing, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

7. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Panama Canal Consultative Committee, composed of an equal number of high-level representatives of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, and which may appoint such subcommittees as it may deem appropriate. This Committee shall advise the United States of America and the Republic of Panama on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operation. In view of both Parties' special interest in the continuity and efficiency of the Canal operation in the future, the Committee shall advise on matters such as general tolls policy, employment and training policies to increase the participation of Panamanian nationals in the operation of the Canal, and international policies on matters concerning the Canal. The Committee's recommendations shall be transmitted to the two Governments, which shall give such recommendations full consideration in the formulation of such policy decisions.

8. In addition to the participation of Panamanian nationals at high management levels of the Panama Canal Commission, as provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article, there shall be growing participation of Panamanian nationals at all other levels and areas of employment in the aforesaid Commission, with the objective of preparing, in an orderly and efficient fashion, for the assumption by the Republic of Panama of full responsibility for the management, operation and maintenance of the Canal upon the termination of this Treaty.

9. The use of the areas, waters and installations with respect to which the United States of America is granted rights pursuant to the Article, and the rights and legal status of United States Government agencies and employees operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Article, shall be governed by the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date.

10. Upon entry into force of this Treaty, the United States Government agencies known as the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the territory of the Republic of Panama that formerly constituted the Canal Zone.

PROTECTION AND DEFENSE

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal. Each Party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it.

2. For the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. The rights of the United States of America to station, train, and move military forces within the Republic of Panama are described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date. The use of areas and installations and the legal status of the armed forces of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall be governed by the aforesaid Agreement.

3. In order to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the armed forces of both Parties in the protection and defense of the Canal, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Combined Board comprised of an equal number of senior military representatives of each Party. These representatives shall be charged by their respective governments with consulting and cooperating on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the Canal, and with planning for actions to be taken in concert for that purpose. Such combined protection and defense arrangements shall not inhibit the identity of lines of authority of the armed forces of the United States of America or the Republic of Panama. The Combined Board shall provide for coordination and cooperation concerning such matters as:

(a) The preparation of contingency plans for the protection and defense of the Canal based upon the cooperative efforts of the armed forces of both Parties.

(b) The planning and conduct of combined military exercises; and

(c) The conduct of United States and Panamanian military operations with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

4. The Combined Board shall, at five-year intervals throughout the duration of this Treaty, review the resources being made available by the two Parties for the protection and defense of the Canal. Also, the Combined Board shall make appropriate recommendations to the two Governments respecting projected requirements, the efficient utilization of available resources of the two Parties, and other matters of mutual interest with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

5. To the extent possible consistent with its primary responsibility for the protection and defense of the Panama Canal, the United States of America will endeavor to maintain its armed forces in the Republic of Panama in normal times at a level not in excess of that of the armed forces of the United States of America in the territory of the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

ARTICLE V

PRINCIPLE OF NON-INTERVENTION

Employees of the Panama Canal Commission, their dependents and designated contractors of the Panama Canal Commission, who are nationals of the United States of America, shall respect the laws of the Republic of Panama and shall abstain from any activity incompatible with the spirit of this Treaty. Accordingly, they shall abstain from any political activity in the Republic of Panama as well as from any intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama. The United States of America shall take all measures within its authority to ensure that the provisions of this Article are fulfilled.

PROTECTION OF THE ENVIRONMENT

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to implement this Treaty in a manner consistent with the protection of the natural environment of the Republic of Panama. To this end, they shall consult and cooperate with each other in all appropriate ways to ensure that they shall give due regard to the protection and conservation of the environment.

2. A Joint Commission on the Environment shall be established with equal representation from the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, which shall periodically review the implementation of this Treaty and shall recommend as appropriate to the two Government ways to avoid or, should this not be possible, to mitigate the adverse environmental impacts which might result from their respective actions pursuant to the Treaty.

3. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall furnish the Joint Commission on the Environment complete information on any action taken in accordance with this Treaty which, in the judgment of both, might have a significant effect on the environment. Such information shall be made available to the Commission as far in advance of the contemplated action as possible to facilitate the study by the Commission of any potential environmental problems and to allow for consideration of the recommendation of the Commission before the contemplated action is carried out.

ARTICLE VII

FLAGS

1. The entire territory of the Republic of Panama, including the areas the use of which the Republic of Panama makes available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, shall be under the flag of the Republic of Panama, and consequently such flag always shall occupy the position of honor.

2. The flag of the United States of America may be displayed, together with the flag of the Republic of Panama, at the headquarters of the Panama Canal Commission, at this site of the Combined Board, and as provided in the Agreement in Implementation of Article IV of this Treaty.

3. The flag of the United States of America also may be displayed at other places and on some occasions, as agreed by both Parties.

ARTICLE VIII

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

1. The installations owned or used by the agencies or instrumentalities of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, and their official archives and documents, shall be inviolable. The two Parties shall agree on procedures to be followed in the conduct of any criminal investigation at such locations by the Republic of Panama.

2. Agencies and instrumentalities of the Government of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama.

3. In addition to such other privileges and immunities as are afforded to employees of the United States Government and their dependents pursuant to this Treaty, the United States of America may designate up to twenty officials of the Panama Canal Commission who, along with their dependents, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded to diplomatic agents and their dependents under international law and practice. The United States of America shall furnish to the Republic of Panama a list of the names of said officials and their dependents, identify in the positions they occupy in the Government of the United States of America, and shall keep such list current at all times.

ARTICLE IX

APPLICABLE LAWS AND ENFORCEMENT

In accordance with the provisions of this Treaty and related agreements, the law of the Republic of Panama shall apply in the areas made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty. The law of the Republic of Panama shall be applied to matters or events which occurred in the former Canal Zone prior to the entry into force of this Treaty only to the extent specifically provided in prior treaties and agreements.

2. Natural or juridical persons who, on the date of entry into force of this Treaty, are engaged in business or non-profit activities at locations in the former Canal Zone may continue such business or activities at those locations under the same terms and conditions prevailing prior to the entry into force of this Treaty for a thirty-month transition period from its entry into force. The Republic of Panama shall maintain the same operating conditions as those applicable to the aforementioned enterprises prior to the entry into force of this Treaty in order that they may receive licenses to do business in the Republic of Panama subject to their compliance with the requirements of its law. Thereafter, such persons shall receive the same treatment under the law of the Republic of Panama as similar enterprises already established in the rest of the territory of the Republic of Panama without discrimination.

3. The rights of ownership, as recognized by the United States of America, enjoyed by natural or juridical private persons in buildings and other improvements to real property located in the former Canal Zone shall be recognized by the Republic of Panama in conformity with its laws.

4. With respect to buildings and other improvements to real property located in the Canal operating areas, housing areas or other areas subject to the licensing procedure established in Article IV of the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty, the owners shall be authorized to continue using the land upon which their property is located in accordance with the procedures established in that Article.

5. With respect to buildings and other improvements to real property located in areas of the former Canal Zone to which the aforesaid licensing procedure is not applicable, or may cease to be applicable during the lifetime or upon termination of this Treaty, the owners may continue to use the land upon which their property is located, subject to the payment of a reasonable charge to the Republic of Panama. Should the Republic of Panama decide to sell such land, the owners of the buildings or other improvements located thereon shall be offered a first option to purchase such land at a reasonable cost. In the case of non-profit enterprises, such as churches' and fraternal organizations, the cost of the purchase will be nominal in accordance with the prevailing practice in the rest of the territory of the Republic of Panama.

6. If any of the aforementioned persons are required by the Republic of Panama to discontinue their activities or vacate their property for public purposes, they shall be compensated at fair market value by the Republic of Panama.

7. The provisions of paragraphs 2-6 above shall apply to natural or juridical persons who have been engaged in business or non-profit activities at locations in the former Canal Zone for at least six months prior to the date of signature of this Treaty.

8. The Republic of Panama shall not issue, adopt or enforce any law, decrees, regulation, or international agreement or take any other action which purports to regulate or would otherwise interfere with the exercise on the part of the United States of America of any right granted under this Treaty or related agreements.

9. Vessels transiting the Canal, and cargo, passengers and crews carried on such vessels shall be exempt from any taxes, fees, or other charges by the Republic of Panama. However, in the event such vessels call at a Panamanian port, they may be assessed charges incident thereto, such as charges for services provided to the vessel. The Republic of Panama may also require the passengers and crew disembarking from such vessels to pay such taxes, fees and charges as are established under Panamanian law for persons entering its territory. Such taxes, fees and charges shall be assessed on a nondiscriminatory basis.

10. ARTICLE X

EMPLOYMENT WITH THE PANAMA CANAL COMMISSION

1. In exercising its rights and fulfilling its responsibilities as the employer, the United States of America shall establish employment and labor regulations which shall contain the terms, conditions and prerequisites for all categories of employees of the Panama Canal Commission. These regulations shall be provided to the Republic of Panama prior to their entry into force.

2. (a) The regulations shall establish a system of preference when hiring employees, for Panamanian applicants possessing the skills and qualifications required for employment by the Panama Canal Commission. The United States of America shall endeavor to ensure that the number of Panamanian nationals employed by the Panama Canal Commission in relation to the total number of its employees will conform to the proportion established for foreign enterprises under the law of the Republic of Panama.

(b) The terms and conditions of employment to be established will in general be no less favorable to persons already employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, than those in effect immediately prior to that date.

3. (a) The United States of America shall establish an employment policy for the Panama Canal Commission that shall generally limit the recruitment of personnel outside the Republic of Panama to persons possessing requisite skills and qualifications which are not available in the Republic of Panama.

(b) The United States of America will establish training programs for Panamanian employees and apprentices in order to increase the number of Panamanian nationals qualified to assume positions with the Panama Canal Commission, as positions become available.

(c) Within five years from the entry into force of this Treaty, the number of United States nationals employed by the Panama Canal Commission who were previously employed by the Panama Canal Company shall be at least twenty percent less than the total number of United States nationals working for the Panama Canal Company immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

(d) The United States of America shall periodically inform the Republic of Panama, through the Coordinating Committee, established pursuant to the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty, of available positions within the Panama Canal Commission. The Republic of Panama shall similarly provide the United States of America any information it may have as to the availability of Panamanian nationals claiming to have skills and qualifications that might be required by the Panama Canal Commission, in order that the United States of America may take this information into account.

4. The United States of America will establish qualification standards for skills, training and experience required by the Panama Canal Commission. In establishing such standards, to the extent they include a requirement for a professional license, the United States of America, without prejudice to its right to require additional professional skills and qualifications, shall recognize the professional licenses issued by the Republic of Panama.

5. The United States of America shall establish a policy for the periodic rotation, at a maximum of every five years, of United States citizen employees and other non-Panamanian employees, hired after the entry into force of this Treaty. It is recognized that certain exceptions to the said policy of rotation may be made for sound administrative reasons, such as in the case of employees holding positions requiring certain non-transferable or non-recrutable skills.

6. With regard to wages and fringe benefits, there shall be no discrimination on the basis of nationality, sex, or race. Payments by the Panama Canal Commission of additional remuneration, or the provision of other benefits, such as home leave benefits, to United States nationals employed prior to entry into force of this Treaty, or to persons of any nationality, including Panamanian nationals who are thereafter recruited outside of the Republic of Panama and who change their place of residence, shall not be considered to be discrimination for the purpose of this paragraph.

7. Persons employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, who are displaced from their employment as a result of the discontinuance by the United States of America of certain activities pursuant to this Treaty, will be placed by the United States of America, to the maximum extent feasible, in other appropriate jobs with the Government of the United States in accordance with United States Civil Service regulations. For such persons who are not United States nationals, placement efforts will be confined to

United States Government activities located within the Republic of Panama. Likewise, persons previously employed in activities for which the Republic of Panama assumes responsibility as a result of this Treaty will be continued in their employment to the maximum extent feasible by the Republic of Panama. The Republic of Panama shall, to the maximum extent feasible, ensure that the terms and conditions of employment applicable to personnel employed in the activities for which it assumes responsibility are no less favorable than those in effect immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty. Non-United States nationals employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty who are involuntarily separated from their positions because of the discontinuance of an activity by reason of this Treaty, who are not entitled to an immediate annuity under the United States Civil Service Retirement System, and for whom continued employment in the Republic of Panama by the Government of the United States of America is not practicable, will be provided special job placement assistance by the Republic of Panama for employment in positions for which they may be qualified by experience and training.

8. The Parties agree to establish a system whereby the Panama Canal Commission may, if deemed mutually convenient or desirable by the two Parties, assign certain employees of the Panama Canal Commission, for a limited period of time, to assist in the operation of activities transferred to the responsibility of the Republic of Panama as a result of this Treaty or related agreements. The salaries and other costs of employment of any such persons assigned to provide such assistance shall be reimbursed to the United States of America by the Republic of Panama.

9. (a) The right of employees to negotiate collective contracts with the Panama Canal Commission is recognized. Labor relations with employees of the Panama Canal Commission shall be conducted in accordance with forms of collective bargaining established by the United States of America after consultation with employee unions.

(b) Employee unions shall have the right to affiliate with international labor organizations.

10. The United States of America will provide an appropriate early optional retirement program for all persons employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty. In this regard, taking into account the unique circumstances created by the provisions of this Treaty, including its duration, and their effect upon such employees, the United States of America shall, with respect to them:

(a) determine that conditions exist which invoke applicable United States law permitting early retirement annuities and apply such law for a substantial period of the duration of the Treaty;

(b) seek special legislation to provide more liberal entitlement to, and calculation of, retirement annuities than is currently provided for by law.

ARTICLE XI

PROVISIONS FOR THE TRANSITION PERIOD

The Republic of Panama shall reassume plenary jurisdiction over the former Canal Zone upon entry into force of this Treaty and in accordance with its terms.

1. In order to provide for an orderly transition to the full application of the jurisdictional arrangements established by this Treaty and related agreements, the provisions of this Article shall become applicable upon the date this Treaty enters into force, and shall remain in effect for thirty calendar months. The authority granted in this Article to the United States of America for this transition period shall supplement, and is not intended to limit, the full application and effect of the rights and authority granted to the United States of America elsewhere in this Treaty and in related agreements.

2. During this transition period, the criminal and civil laws of the United States of America shall apply concurrently with those of the Republic of Panama in certain of the areas and installations made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty, in accordance with the following provisions:

(i) for any offense committed during the transition period within such areas and installations, and

(ii) for any offense committed prior to that period in the former Canal Zone. (b) Either Party may waive its primary right to exercise jurisdiction in a specific case or category of cases.

3. The United States of America shall retain the right to exercise jurisdiction in criminal cases relating to offenses committed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty in violation of the laws applicable in the former Canal Zone.

4. For the transition period, the United States of America shall retain police authority and maintain a police force in the aforementioned areas and installations. In such areas, the police authorities of the United States of America may take into custody any person not subject to their primary jurisdiction if such person is believed to have committed or to be committing an offense against applicable laws or regulations, and shall promptly transfer custody to the police authorities of the Republic of Panama. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish joint police patrols in agreed areas. Any arrests conducted by a joint patrol shall be the responsibility of the patrol member or members representing the Party having primary jurisdiction over the person or persons arrested.

5. The court of the United States of America and related personnel, functioning in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, may continue to function during the transition period for the judicial enforcement of the jurisdiction to be exercised by the United States of America in accordance with this Article.

6. In civil cases, the civilian courts of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall have no jurisdiction over new cases of a private civil nature, but shall retain full jurisdiction during the transition period to dispose of any civil cases, including admiralty cases, already instituted and pending before the courts prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

7. The laws, regulations, and administrative authority of the United States of America applicable in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty shall, to the extent not inconsistent with this Treaty and related agreements, continue in force for the purpose of the exercise by the United States of America of law enforcement and judicial jurisdiction only during the transition period. The United States of America may amend, repeal or otherwise change such laws, regulations and administrative authority. The two Parties shall consult concerning procedural and substantive matters relative to the implementation of this Article, including the disposition of cases pending at the end of the transition period and, in this respect, may enter into appropriate agreements by an exchange of notes or other instrument.

8. During this transition period, the United States of America may continue to incarcerate individuals in the areas and installations made available for the use of the United States of America by the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, or to transfer them to penal facilities in the United States of America to serve their sentences.

A SEA-LEVEL CANAL OR A THIRD LANE OF LOCKS

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama recognize that a sea-level canal may be important for international navigation in the future. Consequently, during the duration of this Treaty, both Parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea-level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms, agreeable to both Parties, for its construction.

2. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree on the following:

(a) No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this Treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty, or as the two Parties may otherwise agree; and

(b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

3. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States of America the right to add a third land of locks to the existing Panama Canal. This right may be exercised at any time during the duration of this Treaty, provided that the United States of America has delivered to the Republic of Panama copies of the plans for such construction.

4. In the event the United States of America exercises the right granted in paragraph 3 above, it may use for that purpose, in addition to the areas otherwise made available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty, such other areas as the two Parties may agree upon. The terms and conditions applicable to Canal operating areas made available by the Republic of Panama for the use of the United States of America pursuant to Article III of this Treaty shall apply in a similar manner to such additional areas.

(a) Upon the entry into force of this Treaty, the Panama Railroad and such property that was located in the former Canal Zone but that is not within the land and water areas the use of which is made available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty. However, it is agreed that the transfer on such date shall not include buildings and other facilities, except housing, the use of which is retained by the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, outside such areas;

(b) Such property located in an area or a portion thereof at such time as the use by the United States of America of such area or portion thereof ceases pursuant to agreement between the two Parties.

3. The Republic of Panama agrees to hold the United States of America harmless with respect to any claims which may be made by third parties relating to rights, title and interest in such property.

4. The Republic of Panama shall receive, in addition, from the Panama Canal Commission a just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal, in accordance with the following:

(a) An annual amount to be paid out of Canal operating revenues computed at a rate of thirty hundredths of a United States dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, for each vessel transiting the Canal, after the entry into force of this Treaty, for which tolls are charged. The rate of thirty hundredths of a United States dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, will be adjusted to reflect changes in the United States wholesale price index for total manufactured goods during biennial periods. The first adjustment shall take place five years after entry into force of this Treaty, taking into account the changes that occurred in such price index during the preceding two years. Thereafter successive adjustments shall take place at the end of each biennial period. If the United States of America should decide that another indexing method is preferable, such method shall be proposed to the Republic of Panama and applied if mutually agreed.

(b) A fixed annuity of ten million United States dollars (10,000,000) to be paid out of Canal operating revenues. This amount shall constitute a fixed expense of the Panama Canal Commission.

(c) An annual amount of up to ten million United States dollars (10,000,000) per year, to be paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts paid pursuant to this Treaty. In the event Canal operating revenues in any year do not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this payment, the unpaid balance shall be paid from operating surpluses in future years in a manner to be mutually agreed.

ARTICLE XIV

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

(b) Those areas of military coordination in which joint police patrols are established pursuant to the provisions of the Agreement in Implementation of Article IV of this Treaty, signed this date. The two police authorities shall develop appropriate administrative arrangements for the scheduling and conduct of such joint police patrol.

II. TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty. The same regime of neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE II

The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there will be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, concerning the conditions or charges of transit, or for any other reason, and so that the Canal, and therefore the Isthmus of Panama, shall not be the target of reprisals in any armed conflict between other nations of the world. The foregoing shall be subject to the following requirements:

(a) Payment of tolls and their charges for transit and ancillary services, provided they have been fixed in conformity with the provisions of Article III (c);

(b) Compliance with applicable rules and regulations, provided such rules and regulations are applied in conformity with the provisions of Article III;

(c) The requirement that transiting vessels commit no acts of hostility while in the Canal; and

(d) Such other conditions and restrictions as are established by this Treaty.

ARTICLE III

1. For purposes of the security, efficiency and proper maintenance of the Canal the following rules shall apply:

(a) The Canal shall be operated efficiently in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal, and rules and regulations that shall be just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal;

(b) Ancillary services necessary for transit through the Canal shall be provided;

(c) Tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services shall be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law;

(d) As a pre-condition of transit, vessels may be required to establish clearly the financial responsibility and guarantees for payment of reasonable and adequate indemnification, consistent with international practice and standards, for damages resulting from acts or omissions of such vessels when passing through the Canal. In the case of a vessel owned or operated by a State or for which it has acknowledged responsibility, a certification by that State that it shall observe its obligations under international law to pay for damages resulting from the act or omission of such vessels when passing through the Canal shall be deemed sufficient to establish such financial responsibility;

(e) Vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of all nations shall at all times be entitled to transit the Canal, irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination or armament, without being subjected, as a condition of transit, to inspection, search or surveillance. However, such vessels may be required to certify that they have complied with all applicable health, sanitation and quarantine regulations. In addition, such vessels shall be entitled to refuse to disclose their internal operation, origin, armament, cargo or destination. However, auxiliary vessels may be required to present written assurances, certified by an official at a high level of the government of the State requesting the exemption, that they are owned or operated by that government and in this case are being used only on government noncommercial service.

2. For the purposes of this Treaty, the terms "Canal," "vessel of war," "auxiliary vessel," "internal operation," "armament" and "inspection" shall have the meanings assigned them in Annex A to this Treaty.

ARTICLE IV

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE V

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the Canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

ARTICLE VI

1. In recognition of the important contributions of the United States of America and of the Republic of Panama to the construction, operation, maintenance, and protection and defense of the Canal, vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of those nations shall, notwithstanding any other provisions of this Treaty, be entitled to transit the Canal irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination, armament or cargo carried. Such vessels of war and auxiliary vessels will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously.

2. The United States of America, so long as it has responsibility for the operation of the Canal, may continue to provide the Republic of Colombia toll-free transit through the Canal for its troops, vessels and materials of war. Thereafter, the Republic of Panama may provide the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Costa Rica with the right of toll-free transit.

ARTICLE VII

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall jointly sponsor a resolution in the Organization of American States opening to accession by all States of the world the Protocol to this Treaty whereby all the signatories will adhere to the objectives of this Treaty, agreeing to respect to regime of neutrality set forth herein.

2. The Organization of American States shall act as the depositary for this Treaty and related instruments.

ARTICLE VIII

This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

HON. JOHN SPARKMAN.

Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to a request from your staff for clarification regarding the content of certain documents published in connection with the Senate's consideration of the Panama Canal Treaties.

First, the "Agreed Minute" to the Panama Canal Treaty constitutes an integral part of that Treaty and was accordingly bound together with the signed original text. The Agreed Minute was contained in the initial reproduction of the Treaty provided to members of the Senate by the Department, and in various public documents subsequently published by the Department. Unfortunately, the particular printing reproduced at pages 201-220 of the Committee's recent report (Exec. Rept. No. 95-12) did not include the Agreed Minute, and we regret any inconvenience this may have caused the Committee.

Second, we understand that some confusion has developed as a result of a printing error appearing on page 38 of the Committee print of the President's transmittal message (Exec. N). That document incorrectly identifies the Protocol to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal as "Annex B". "Annex B" to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal is in fact comprised of the maps which appear at pages 216-218 of the Committee's report, which correctly identifies them as such.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS J. BENNET, Jr.
*Assistant Secretary

EXCERPTS FROM THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES (SEN. EX. REPT. 95-12)

II. COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

On January 26, the Committee concluded its hearings on the proposed Panama Canal agreements. Senator Robert C. Byrd, the Majority Leader, appeared before the Committee and testified in support of the agreements. In concluding his prepared statement, the Majority Leader addressed the Chair, and expressed "the hope that this Committee, in its recommendations to the Senate, will provide guidance as to how best to meet the concerns that many of us have about the treaties. * * *" He also cautioned the Committee not to create a situation that "would undercut all that has been done to move us toward a successful resolution of this matter."

Following the Majority Leader's presentation, Chairman Sparkman suggested to the Committee that it approve the following course of action:

"Under the circumstances, it seems like it would be the best procedure for the committee to make its recommendations to the Senate on amendments, reservations, or understandings in the committee report, but not as specific proposals in the resolution of ratification. As I understand it, that is in conformity with the wishes of the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader, I believe.

"This will allow the committee to make its views known to the Senate on specific amendments, reservations and understandings, and at the same time permit all members of the Senate to have maximum participation in the shaping of the Senate's action on these treaties. There will, of course, be recorded votes in the committee on any major proposal presented, and these votes will be recorded in the committee report.

"I recognize that this procedure is unusual, and I may say that as a matter of fact I myself would have much preferred following the more usual route. But we are in an unusual situation and we do have the well-expressed views from the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader. For that reason and since it is an unusual problem I think a departure from the standard committee procedure is justified if that is necessary to enable the Senate best to work its will on such an important issue."

This procedure had been discussed earlier with the Senate leadership and members of the Committee. Following its formal presentation to the Committee, Senator Case moved its adoption and the Committee approved it without objection.

The Committee does not view the procedure as a precedent-setting departure from established practice. Quite the contrary—the Committee views the procedure as unique, but one which is necessitated because the situation posed by the consideration of the Panama Canal treaties is in many ways unique.

This point was made clear in the following exchange between Senator Pell and the Majority Leader on January 26:

Senator PELL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I have no questions and no real statement except to say that I hope this procedure would not become a precedent. I recognize the political imperatives that call for every member of the Senate to vote in order to show his position to his own constituents at home on the matter. * * *

Senator BYRD. * * * this will not be a precedent.

With the inclusion of the recommendations listed below, the Committee's support for the treaties is virtually unanimous—with 14 members supporting ratification and only one opposing.

Because the Committee firmly believes that ratification of the treaties will best serve our national interests, it agrees to depart from standard practice and to include its recommendations in the Committee's report instead of in the resolutions of ratification.

In the Committee's view, the ultimate purpose is to serve the national interest by gaining ratification of the treaties in a manner that is fully acceptable and legally binding on both parties. To achieve this objective, two-thirds of members of the Senate present and voting must consent to ratification. In the Committee's opinion, the likelihood of securing this vote will be enhanced substantially by permitting the full Senate to work its will on the treaties and the resolutions of ratification without any formal encumbrances on them.

In taking this course of action, however, the Committee by no means intends to denigrate the importance of the specific recommendations listed below. Indeed, the Committee's strong support for the treaties is based, in large part, upon the recommendation approved overwhelmingly by the Committee. Without them, particularly the amendments to the neutrality treaty, many members of the Committee might have considerable reluctance in urging the Senate to ratify this agreement. But the Committee explicitly did condition its favorable recommendation with respect to the resolution of ratification accompanying the Panama Canal Treaty upon the Senate's approval of the resolution of ratification accompanying the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Canal.

Conversely, the Committee believed it undesirable to make any recommendations beyond the ones it approved. During its mark-up sessions, members of the Committee considered all of the amendments, reservations and understandings which had been introduced up to that point, plus additional measures offered by the members themselves. It either rejected or set aside all of them except for two amendments and four understandings (two of which are identical). The two amendments approved by the Committee serve to incorporate the language of the Carter-Torrijos communique into the neutrality agreement.

The adoption of these Committee amendments made many other amendments moot, such as those offered by Senator Hollings, and Senator Dole, and Senator Bentsen. Their amendments were designed for the same purpose and each of the Senators along with the Majority and Minority Leaders—deserve much of the credit for underscoring the importance of this issue. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to all of them.

All of the other measures presented for consideration were rejected by the Committee. In the Committee's view, this action was necessary because the adoption of any of them would serve only to cripple the treaties and to render them unacceptable. Additionally, approval of any of these provisions would seriously raise the prospect of requiring the Government of Panama to hold another plebiscite. In the Committee's view, it is desirable to avoid such a requirement to the maximum extent possible. The recommendations listed below accord with this view and do not run the risk of requiring another Panamanian plebiscite. The Committee's opinion in this regard is based on conversations with General Torrijos and other Panamanian officials, plus spokesmen from our own executive branch.

A. Amendment incorporating in article IV of the Neutrality Treaty the rights of defense set forth in Carter-Torrijos joint statement

The Committee recommends that article IV of the Neutrality Treaty be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

B. Amendment incorporating in article VI of the Neutrality Treaty the rights of priority passage set forth in the Carter-Torrijos joint statement

The Committee recommends that article VI of the Neutrality Treaty be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

In accordance with the Statement of Understanding mentioned in Article IV above: "The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."

STATEMENT OF INTENT

The Committee's intent in recommending the adoption of these two amendments to the Neutrality Treaty is that the Carter-Torrijos Joint Statement of October 14, 1977, be made an integral part of the treaty with the same force and effect as those treaty provisions submitted to the Senate initially for its advice and consent.

The Committee had originally voted to include the Joint Statement in a single amendment which would have added as a new article IX to the treaty. Upon being advised by the State Department—contrary to previous advice—that this placement could require a new Panamanian plebiscite, the Committee voted to reconsider the proposed article IX and voted instead to recommend the addition of that same material, in two parts, to articles IV and VI. This did not represent a "flip-flop"; in each instance the substantive wording was identical to that of the Joint Statement, and each provision—whether placed in one article or in two—would have had precisely the same legal effect, being equally binding internationally. The difference is purely one of cosmetics. If a negligible change in form, with no change whatever in substance, could obviate the need for a new plebiscite—an eventuality which could complicate vastly the ratification process—then the Committee concluded that it would happily oblige.

The meaning of these amendments, which together constitute the entire Joint Statement, is plain. The first amendment relates to the right of the United States to defend the Canal. (It creates no automatic obligation to do so. See p. 74 of this report.) It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however the Canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the Canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. When such steps shall be taken is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act if it deems proper against any threat to the Canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or non-military. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty. They do not terminate.

The above-described rights are not affected by the second paragraph of the amendment, which provides that the United States has no "right of intervention . . . in the internal affairs of Panama," and which prohibits the United States from acting "against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama." The Committee notes, first, that these provisions prohibit the United States from doing nothing that it is not already prohibited from doing under the United Nations Charter, which proscribes "the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state" (article 2(4)). The Committee never supposed that the United States, in entering into the Neutrality Treaty, intended to obtain powers that it had previously renounced. The Committee thus does not believe that the provision in question substantively alters existing United States commitments to Panama.

Second, the prohibitions set forth in the second paragraph do not derogate from the rights conferred in the first. The Joint Statement recognizes that the use of Panamanian territory might be required to defend the Canal. But that use would be for the sole purpose of defending the Canal—it would be purely incidental to the Canal's defense; it would be strictly a means to that end, rather than an end in itself; and it would not be carried out for the purpose of taking Panamanian territory. The concepts of the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama are, in short, an integral part of the treaty, so that action directed at preserving the regime of neutrality set forth in the treaty would never be directed against Panama's territorial integrity or political independence.

For these reasons, use of Panamanian territory to defend the Canal would clearly be permissible under the portion of the Joint Statement incorporated in Article IV. This is made clear in an opinion presented to the Committee by the Department of Justice (hearings, part 1, p. 332):

"A legitimate exercise of rights under the Neutrality Treaty by the United States would not, either in intent or in fact, be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama. No question of detaching territory from the sovereignty or jurisdiction of Panama would arise. Nor would the political independence of Panama be violated by measures calculated to uphold a commitment to the maintenance of the Canal's neutrality which Panama has freely assumed. A use of force in these circumstances would not be directed against the form or character of composition of the Government of Panama or any other aspect of its political independence; it would be solely directed and proportionately crafted to maintain the neutrality of the Canal."

Finally, even if a conflict were somehow to arise between the two paragraphs, because the United States has the right to act against "any . . . threat directed against the Canal," there is no question that the first would prevail. The rights conferred therein are stated in absolute terms and must therefore be construed as controlling.

The meaning of the recommended amendment to article VI is equally clear. This provision—extracted verbatim from the Joint Statement—confers upon United States warships and auxiliary vessels the right to go "to the head of the line" in an "emergency". What constitutes an emergency, and when one exists, is for the United States and the United States alone to determine. The provision could hardly be more explicit.

Like the recommended amendment to article IV, this amendment, if adopted by the Senate, will become an integral part of the treaty, of the same force and effect as all other provisions. The Committee is informed by the Department of State that the Government of the Republic of Panama has concluded that no new plebiscite will be required for the approval of the two amendments. Together, they comprise the verbatim text of the Joint Statement, which was read by General Torrijos to the people of Panama live on national television three days before the October 23 plebiscite. (See p. 478 of part 1 of the hearings for a list of Panamanian newspapers in which the Joint Statement appeared prior to the holding of the plebiscite.) It thus is clear that the Panamanian people were fully apprised of the Joint Statement prior to the plebiscite, and were accorded a full opportunity to consider its provisions before approving the treaties.

C. Understanding regarding the requirement to conclude a prisoner transfer agreement (article IX (11), Panama Canal Treaty).

The Committee recommends that the resolution of ratification to the Panama Canal Treaty be amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "subject to the following understanding:

"Any agreement concluded pursuant to article IX, paragraph 11 with respect to the transfer of prisoners shall be concluded in accordance with the constitutional processes of both parties"

STATEMENT OF INTENT

Article IX (11) of the Panama Canal Treaty provides as follows:

"11. The Parties shall conclude an agreement whereby nationals of either State, who are sentenced by the courts of the other State, and who are not domiciled therein, may elect to serve their sentences in their State of nationality."

The Committee intends, through the above understanding regarding this provision, to make clear (1) that any agreement negotiated on this subject be submitted to the Senate as a treaty for its advice and consent to ratification; and (2) that should the Senate not give its advice and consent to the ratification of such an agreement, the United States will not be in violation of this provision.

As paragraph 11 of article IX is drafted, it can be construed as authority for the President to enter into a prisoner transfer agreement with Panama as an executive agreement. This, in the Committee's judgment, would be undesirable; United States practice with respect to such agreements, limited though it is, has been that they be concluded as treaties. Sound policy reasons underlie this procedure. Prisoner transfer arrangements are significant international agreements; they involve important foreign policy judgments regarding the criminal justice systems and human rights practices of the countries proposed as parties to such arrangements. The Treaty Clause requires that, normally significant international commitments be made with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate. Acting on the basis of his sole constitutional authority, the President would be without the power to enter into such an agreement. By removing any possibility that this provision may be relied upon as a source of authority for the conclusion of such an agreement, and by requiring that the agreement be entered into "in accordance with the constitutional processes" of the United States, this addition to the resolution of ratification will state the understanding of the Senate that any such agreement must be submitted to the Senate as a treaty, which is the mode contemplated by our "constitutional processes".

The understanding will, moreover, clarify the international commitment undertaken by the United States in this provision. As paragraph 11 has been drafted, it could be construed as requiring the United States to enter into a prisoner transfer agreement, and would thereby place the United States in violation of this treaty should the United States elect not to do so. Obviously, the authority of the Senate to advise and consent to a treaty is meaningless if it is required to be given; the authority to disapprove is implied if our "constitutional processes" are to be upheld. The effect of the reference to "constitutional processes" is thus to make clear that a right of choice is maintained. Although this understanding should not be interpreted as suggesting a disinclination to advise and consent to such a treaty, paragraph 11 should not be construed, pursuant to it, as circumscribing the authority of the Senate to exercise the full measure of its constitutional discretion.

D. Understanding regarding the prohibition against certain negotiations (article XII (2) (b), Panama Canal Treaty).

The Committee recommends that the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty be amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "subject to the following understanding:

"The United States does not construe article XII, paragraph 2, clause b as precluding the President from exercising his constitutional authority to confer with any State regarding an interoceanic canal route or option in the Western Hemisphere; but, pursuant to such provision, the United States will not conclude with a third State a treaty for the rights to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties to the Panama Canal Treaty agree."

Subparagraph (b) of article XII(2) of the Panama Canal Treaty provides as follows:

"(b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree."

The Committee intends, through the above understanding regarding this provision, to make clear that the provision may not be construed as precluding a future President from exercising his constitutional power to confer with other governments. "[H]e [the President] alone negotiates," the Supreme Court has said. "Into the field of negotiation, the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it." United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 319 (1936). A President may voluntarily commit himself not to enter into certain negotiations, but he cannot circumscribe the discretion of his successors to do so, just as they may not be limited in so doing by treaty or by law. As this Committee said in 1816, the President "must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success." U.S. Senate, Reports, Committee on Foreign Relations, vol. 8, p. 24. The recommended understanding would resolve this constitutional difficulty without doing violence to the substantive provisions of the treaty, the purpose of which, in the Committee's judgment, is to ensure that the United States not, during the duration of the treaty, enter into an agreement to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere without the agreement of Panama.

E. Understanding requiring the inclusion of Senate actions in the instrument of ratification of the Neutrality Treaty.

The Committee recommends that the resolution of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal be amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "subject to the following understanding:

"The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understandings, declarations, and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this Treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the Government of the Republic of Panama."

F. Understanding requiring the inclusion of Senate actions in the instrument of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty.

The Committee recommends that the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty be amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "subject to the following understanding:

"The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understandings, declarations and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this Treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the Government of the Republic of Panama."

STATEMENT OF INTENT

The Committee intends, through the above understandings which it recommends be added to the resolutions of ratification of each treaty, to make clear that any material included by the Senate in its resolution of ratification for each treaty be included in the instrument of ratification for that treaty given to the government of the Republic of Panama

This understanding has its origins in assertions made by representatives of the Department of State, following Senate approval in 1976 of the resolution of ratification respecting the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation Between the United States and Spain, that the President possessed the authority to exclude from the instrument of ratification respecting that treaty the five-part declaration attached by the Senate to that resolution of ratification. (Members of this Committee advised that, in their judgment, no such discretion existed; a declaration was incorporated by reference in the instrument of ratification, although its text was set forth in an annex to the instrument.)

It remains the position of the Committee that the President is without such authority. Although the Treaty Clause of the Constitution does not expressly address this question, neither does it expressly authorize the Senate to condition its advice and consent to treaties. Traditional United States practice has nevertheless been that the Senate may grant its approval conditionally, just as traditional United States practice has been that, when conditions are attached, those conditions are transmitted as an integral part of the instrument certifying Senate and Presidential approval. That such conditions must be so included is as much a part of customary constitutional law in this country as the right of the Senate to grant conditional consent.

Accordingly, it is not the intent of the Committee to recommend the inclusion of an understanding such as this as a part of the resolutions of ratification respecting future treaties. The Committee was pleased to receive the assurance of the Department of State that the United States instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties would include all amendments of the treaties and of the resolutions of ratification that the Senate includes in the resolutions of ratification (letter from Douglas J. Bennet, Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations, to John J. Sparkman, Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, January 26, 1978; hearings, part 5). The Committee does not doubt the Administration's good faith; it hopes that future presidents will adhere to this Administration's position, and thus wishes to establish no precedent with the recommended understandings. Nevertheless, the Committee believes that these understandings should be added to the resolutions of ratification respecting both treaties as a firm demonstration that the Senate will not countenance any interference with its constitutional prerogative of advice and consent and will take steps to counteract such interference on the part of any future Administration.

G. Summary—Recommended resolution of ratification

The Committee recommends that the Senate adopt the following resolutions of ratification, which incorporate the six recommendations of the Committee, described above:

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein). That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Operation and Neutrality of the Panama Canal, together with the Annexes and Protocol relating thereto, done at Washington on September 7, 1977 (Ex. N. Ninety-fifth Congress, first session), subject to the following—

(1) amendments:

(A) Article IV of such Treaty is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

(B) Article VI of such Treaty is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

In accordance with the Statement of Understanding mentioned in Article IV above: "The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly."; and

(2) understanding:

The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understandings, declarations and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this Treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the Government of the Republic of Panama.

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty, together with the Annex and Agreed Minute relating thereto, done at Washington on September 7, 1977 (Ex. N, Ninety-fifth Congress, first session), subject to the following understandings:

"(1) Any agreement concluded pursuant to article IX, paragraph 11 with respect to the transfer of prisoners shall be concluded in accordance with the constitutional processes of both parties.

"(2) The United States does not construe article XII, paragraph 2, clause b as precluding the President from exercising his constitutional authority to confer with any State regarding an interoceanic canal route or option in the Western Hemisphere, but, pursuant to such provision, the United States will not conclude with a third State a treaty for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties to the Panama Canal Treaty agree.

"(3) The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understanding, declarations, and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this Treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the Government of the Republic of Panama."

The Committee recommends that these resolution of ratification be adopted without further change. The two amendments and four understandings set forth above, in the Committees' judgment, more than adequately protect both the national security interests of the United States and the constitutional prerogatives of the Senate.

In the event the Senate concludes that some additional change is necessary, the Committee strongly urges (1) that such material be incorporated in the resolutions of ratification as an understanding, interpretation, declaration, or some similar designation; and (2) that that material not alter the rights, duties and obligations contained in the treaties. Any material so incorporated in the Senate's resolutions of ratification will have precisely the same force and effect, under both domestic and international law, as material included in the text of the treaties themselves. Any amendment to the text of the treaties, however, is virtually certain to require a new Panamanian plebiscite—which the Committee-recommended amendments will not. As noted above, these amendments incorporate the language of the Carter-Torrijos Joint Statement of October 14. That Joint Statement was widely publicized and made available to the Panamanian electorate prior to the plebiscite. No further modifications were contemplated at that time and none was presented to the voters of Panama when they cast their ballots on October 23.

While the Committee does not believe that the Senate should, to avoid the need for a new Panamanian plebiscite, alter the substance of any new material which it believes the national interest of this country requires, it does believe that the Senate can and should take into account the form in which such material is added, since that form, even though legally inconsequential, could mean the ultimate success or failure of the ratification of these treaties.

COMMITTEE COMMENTS

There are a number of reasons why the Committee decided by vote of 14 to 1 to support ratification of the Panama Canal agreements. At the top of the list is the Committee's firm judgment that the proposed agreements promise to serve the national interest—and to serve it well. Underscoring this judgment is the fact that the treaties now before the Senate are the product of 14 years of negotiations.

Indeed, in the course of the past 14 years, 4 successive Administrations—two Republican and two Democratic—have endeavored to negotiate a new treaty relationship acceptable to both Americans and Panamanians. Success has been long in coming, but of this there can be no doubt: The pending Panama treaties are the product of a continuity of shared purpose and reflect the best traditions of a bipartisan foreign policy.

Though some may wish to believe otherwise, the proposed agreements are not the sole product of the Carter Administration. Nor are they the sole product of the Nixon years, which produced the Kissinger-Tack negotiating guidelines of February 1974. Nor are they the sole product of the 1967 draft treaties, which subsequently foundered on the rocks of nationalism. Nor are they the sole product of the agreements reached in September 1965 between President Johnson and President Robies. Nor are they the sole product of the Johnson Administration's decision in December 1964 to negotiate "an entirely new treaty on the existing Panama Canal." Nor are they the sole product of the rioting and bloodshed that erupted in Panama in January 1964 and that cost the lives of 20 Panamanians and 4 Americans. Nor are they the sole product of the 1958 and 1959 flag-raising incidents * * * the 1955 treaty * * * the 1950 Act to Reorganize the Panama Canal Enterprise * * * the war years and the defense site negotiations * * * the 1936 Hull-Alfaro Treaty * * * the demise of the 1926 agreement * * * the Thompson-Urrutia Treaty of 1921 and the payment of $25 million in "canalimony" to Colombia * * * the opening of the Canal in 1914 * * * the events of 1903 * * * Roosevelt, Hay, Cromwell—and Philippe Bunau-Varilla * * * the Hay-Pauncefote agreement * * * Ferdinand DeLesseps * * * the Clayton Bulwer Treaty * * *

The pending agreements are not the product of any single event or incident, or any particular set of events or set of incidents. Rather, they are the product of the sweep of history and, most recently, the collective judgment of American and Panamanian leaders who committed themselves and their political fortunes to fashioning an up-to-date Panama Canal treaty relationship.

The Committee recognizes their untiring efforts and dedication to a political solution. They have threaded the "political needle" of the Panama Canal controversy and in the Committee's opinion their reasons, their decisions and their conclusions have withstood examination and painstaking scrutiny. Accordingly, it is the Committee's view that the pending treaties deserve the full support of the Senate and the American public.

In requesting this support, the Committee urges that one consideration be kept uppermost in mind—the pending agreements are first, foremost and fundamentally, political documents, based on political decisions and grounded in political logic.

They serve to define and accommodate the mutual interests of the United States and of Panama in the operation, maintenance and defense of an international waterway serving the shipping community and the navies of the world. They serve to resolve a complex political question involving an array of issues and sub-issues ranging from strategic policy to economic considerations; from the interpretation of legal standards to the protection of the rights of American and Panamanian citizens; and from the management and operational details of the Canal itself to the possibility of constructing a third set of locks and the building of a sea level canal.

Overhanging and interlacing all of these issues and sub-issues is a fervent nationalism, Panamanian nationalism on one side and American nationalism on the other. From the United States comes the rallying cry, "We bought it. We built it. It's ours. It's as American as the Liberty Bell or the Fourth of July." From Panama comes a different rallying cry, "Yanqui, go home. An end to colonialism. Freedom and independence now."

The nationalist sentiment on both side is as understandable as it is potentially dangerous. The United States succeeded where all others had failed. We conquered the unconquerable. We built the eighth wonder of the world. We linked the earth's two great oceans. We proved our technological prowess then, just as surely as we did in July 1969 when U.S. astronauts landed on the moon. And if the moon-landing was "a giant step for mankind," so, too, was the opening of the Canal in August 1914.

As Americans are justifiably proud of the Canal, the people of Panama are no less proud. It is, after all, the Panama Canal, not the American Canal in Panama.

Simply stated, the Panamanian people are no longer willing to allow another nation to exercise sovereign rights in their country. This is just another way of saying that, though proud of the Canal, the people of Panama are more proud of their own country, their own nation—and rightfully so. Panama can exist without the Canal, but the Canal cannot exist without Panama.

The documents now before the Senate provide a reasonable political solution and at the same time serve to check the spread of nationalist sentiment. They represent a collection of political judgments and decisions. They are a composite of compromises running through and across a tangled bundle of interests, both real and imagined. Not surprisingly, they are just as controversial in our time as the 1903 treaty was in its time.

In the Committee's opinion, it is all but self-evident that the political judgments rendered in the pending treaties will serve better than those rendered 74 years ago. Moreover, the Committee is firmly convinced that the Panama treaties will stand the test of time because they serve the mutual interests of both parties. The political judgments contained in them are balanced, fair and equitable—if not long overdue.

The fact is, the 1903 treaty belongs to another era, despite the half-hearted efforts in 1936 and again in 1955 to dress the wounds inflicted at the turn of century. But in retrospect, these efforts were little more than band-aids on the sores of history. The sores have continued to run and they have brought us to the point where the 1903 agreement, even in its amended form, serves more to jeopardize than to protect our nation's interests in the Panama Canal.

The Committee has not arrived at this decision lightly. If nothing else the hearing process and the materials and information assembled serve as ample testimony to the Committee's efforts to obtain the facts and render a judgment based on them.

In the Committee's opinion, the weight of evidence is overwhelmingly in favor of ratification. Here are the principal considerations based on the terms of the treaties which have brought the Committee to this conclusion:

THE TREATIES GIVE THE UNITED STATES THE DOMINANT ROLE IN A PARTNERSHIP ARRANGEMENT FOR OPERATING THE CANAL DURING THE REMAINDER OF THE 20TH CENTURY

Secretary VANCE. First, as to the long-term operation of the Panama Canal, the United States will control canal operations through a new U.S. Government agency, the Panama Canal Commission, to be supervised by a board composed of five Americans and four Panamanians. The Commission will operate the canal until the end of this century. * * *

The United States will maintain responsibility for managing the canal, setting tolls, and enforcing rules of passage until the year 2000 (P. 11, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES GIVE THE UNITED STATES PRIMARY, DAY-TO-DAY RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DEFENSE OF THE CANAL UNTIL THE YEAR 2000

Secretary of Defense BROWN. The treaty goes even further, however. It states unequivocally that during the life of the treaty, the U.S. armed forces shall enjoy the right and the primary responsibility to defend the canal itself. It further provides that during that period the United States may station, train, and support units of our armed forces in Panama, and that the United States will decide unilaterally whether and how to modify the force levels we maintain there. All key military bases and training areas which we now operate in the Canal Zone will remain under U.S. control. (P. 97, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

* * * * *

THE TREATIES GIVE THE UNITED STATES UNRESTRICTED RIGHT TO MAINTAIN THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY OF THE CANAL FOREVER

Ambassador LINOWITZ. Under the treaty, the United States is in a position to assure that the canal's permanent neutrality is maintained, and there is not, as Secretary Vance has said, any limitation on our ability to take such action as we may deem necessary in the event the canal's neutrality is threatened or violated from any source. The precise type of response we might determine to make would, of course, depend upon all the political, military, legal, economic, and other factors involved in a particular situation, but the key point is that it is for the United States to make the determination as to how we should respond and how we should defend our rights under the canal's regime of neutrality.

Thus, the treaty provides for the United States maximum freedom to determine how to carry out its responsibility for canal neutrality. We are under no obligation to consult with or seek approval from any other nation or international body before acting to maintain the neutrality of the canal, nor [does] the treaty in any other way limit our ability to act. (P. 23, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES GIVE UNITED STATES WARSHIPS AND AUXILIARIES THE RIGHT TO GO TO THE HEAD OF THE LINE IN THE EVENT OF CRISIS OR OTHER EMERGENCY SITUATION

Senator CASE. That is to say you agree, as the negotiator and one who has dealt with this from the beginning, with the Secretary's statement. It means that our ships go to the head of the line?

Secretary VANCE. If necessary.

Ambassador LINOWITZ. If necessary. In other words, if we want to go through first, we are in a position to ask for it and get it. I am sure that both Ambassador Bunker and I understand that to be the meaning of the words "expeditious passage." (P. 31, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES INSURE THAT AFTER THE YEAR 2000 FOREIGN TROOPS WILL NEVER BE STATIONED IN PANAMA

Secretary ALEXANDER I think it is a very positive sign about the attitude of maintaining neutrality after the year 2000. There will be no other country that will be able to be there and we have the unilateral right to insure the concept of the regime of neutrality under the treaty and that there will be complete access. The only interpretation I have heard is that no one other than the Panamanians can retain forces in Panama after the year 2000. (P. 324, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

Ambassador JORDAN. I think one of the interesting features of this particular article, Senator, is that this was not something that we pushed and demanded. This is something that the Panamanians wanted to have in, to put the world on notice at the end of this period when the U.S. forces had left they would never permit any other country to come in and establish bases in their country. (P. 325, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES PROMISE TO HAVE MINIMAL IMPACT ON THE U.S. ECONOMY

Deputy Assistant Secretary (for Maritime Affairs) CASEY. Should toll increases immediately following ratification of the new treaties be about 30 percent, as some have suggested, the same line of reasoning would lead us to conclude that U.S.-flag operators would lose less than 15,000 tons of cargo.

The elasticity approach helps us to illustrate arithmetically what we have understood from the start: that tolls do in fact make up only a small part of the total cost to the consumer of canal-transported commodities. I might add at this point the price elasticity theory is a short-term concept. However, all the economic studies we reviewed indicate that reductions in tonnages through the canal for toll increases approaching 100 percent, tend to be offset by longer-term trade growth. (P. 446, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES FULLY PROTECT THE RIGHTS OF ALL AMERICANS CONNECTED WITH THE OPERATION, MAINTENANCE AND DEFENSE OF THE CANAL

Secretary ALEXANDER. One of the most important issues to be considered regarding the new treaty is how the rights and benefits of current employees of the canal enterprise will be protected. Let me list just a few of the many actions which we will take or propose be taken in order to adequately deal with this matter:

Provision of a priority job placement program.

Provision of an early optional retirement program which would be designed to ease the impact of necessary force reductions while at the same time providing an incentive for employees with essential skills to remain with the Commission.

Assurance of the continued availability of adequate housing.

Provision of the adequate educational and medical services.

Terms and conditions of employment no less favorable than those existing on the effective date of the treaty.

In short, Mr. Chairman, the treaty will provide us with all the rights necessary to adequately care for both the Panamanian and the U.S. citizens of our dedicated work force.

Mr. Chairman, under the treaty we would retain all of the specific rights necessary to efficiently operate the canal and adequately care for our employees. (P. 272, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

THE TREATIES GIVE THE UNITED STATES AN OPPORTUNITY TO MODERNIZE THE CANAL BY ADDING A THIRD LANE OF LOCKS, PLUS AN EXCLUSIVE OPTION TO BUILD A NEW SEA LEVEL CANAL THROUGH PANAMA, THE ONLY SITE RECOMMENDED BY THE INTER-OCEANIC CANAL STUDY COMMISSION IN 1970

Secretary VANCE, The treaties further allow for the modernization of the canal through construction of a third lane of locks and foresee the possibility of construction in Panama of a new, sea-level canal. This would provide access for many modern supertankers and warships which are too large to pass through the present canal. (P. 11, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearing.)

The treaties do all of these things and more. They not only provide for the safe and efficient operation of an open, secure and neutral canal, but additionally, in the words of former Secretary of State Kissinger, they provide "an opportunity to advance fundamental American foreign policy interests." At the same time, Secretary of State Vance sees the treaties promoting fundamental, traditional U.S. values:

"Any nation's foreign policy is based, in the end, not just upon its interests, and in Panama our interests are clear and apparent. It is also based upon the nature and will of its people. I believe the American people want to live in peace with their neighbors, want to be strong, but to use their strength with restraint, want all peoples everywhere to have their own chance to better themselves and to live in self-respect. That is all a part of our American tradition." (P. 14, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

The Committee fully agrees with these observations, but also recognizes that the opportunity presented by the treaties is akin to a double-edged sword and points out that:

Acceptance of the treaties will evidence our firm commitment to the peaceful and equitable settlement of international disputes.

Acceptance of them will evidence our firm commitment to international cooperation among all nations, big or small, rich or poor, developed or undeveloped.

Acceptance of them will evidence our firm commitment to independence and self determination for all nations.

Acceptance of them will evidence our firm commitment to a foreign policy based on preserving the national interest without sacrificing our nation's principles, values or honor.

These are important commitments. If we do not honor them fully, the sword will cut the other way and our adversaries will exploit the situation to the maximum extent possible.

They will charge that the United States talks a good game, that we espouse the principles set forth in the United Nations Charter, that we speak of independence, self determination and human rights—but, when our interests are on line or when we move from the realm of the theoretical to the realm of the practical, that nothing has changed. The United States, they will say, is playing the same old shell game in the Western Hemisphere that it has played for years. The name of the game is Manifest Destiny, backed up by gunboat diplomacy, economic penetration and political subjugation. In a word, imperialism. And as evidence of all of this they will point to Panama and the Canal Zone.

Underscoring this concern, Gen. Maxwell Taylor, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, stated in testimony before the Committee, October 10:

"* * * The Soviet Union always intriguing for leadership in the have-not world has taken as a primary objective the undermining of our Latin American relations, particularly those with our trade partners.

"It will always assure to Panama a large allocation of troublemakers to complicate our problems. Turbulence there is always good news to Moscow—so also are American blunders. In this connection, let us hope that we do not give the Kremlin chiefs the occasion to rejoice which our rejection of these treaties would undoubtedly afford." (P. 58, part 3, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

In a similar vein, but turning attention to Cuba, Secretary of Defense Brown observed:

"I cannot speak for Mr. Castro, but if I were Castro and I wanted to do the most that I could to increase the influence of Cuba in the Caribbean and in Central and Latin America, and decrease and harm the United States psychologically, politically, and diplomatically, I would do all I could to see the treaty rejected." (P. 160, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

With respect to the Western Hemisphere in particular, the foreign policy stakes are indeed much larger than the Panama issue itself. Time after time in the course of its hearings, the Committee was asked to focus on the significance of the treaties as a regional, if not global, issue rather than a bilateral one.

President Carter at the treaty-signing ceremony addressed the matter this way: "This opens a new chapter in our relations with all nations of this hemisphere, and it testifies to the maturity and the good judgment and the decency of our people."

And Secretary of State Vance told the Committee on September 26:

"* * * For years, Latin American peoples and governments have viewed our negotiations with Panama over the canal as a litmus test of our intentions toward their countries." (P. 11, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal Hearings.)

Former Secretary of State Kissinger also addressed this aspect of the issue and dealt with the charge that Latin American leaders say one thing publicly about the Canal issue and quite another thing privately:

"I find it significant that no Western Hemisphere leader, regardless of what his private feelings on this issue might be, feels able publicly to take any position other than that of strongest support for the modernization of the 1903 treaty. This reflects the depth of public sentiment on the issue. No government and no public opinion in any of the countries of this hemisphere would be willing to support us if we now refuse to modernize the canal relationship. We would witness a gradual deterioration of our relationships even when some leaders might prefer to retain constructive ties. If the treaties are accepted, on the other hand, our many friends in the hemisphere will be enabled to cooperate in the development of a constructive Western Hemisphere policy." (P. 527, part 3, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

Representatives of the academic world endorsed these observations. Abraham Lowenthal of the Woodrow Wilson Center for scholars presented the issue this way:

"It is in that context that the Panama issue become so important in U.S.-Latin American relations.

"United States relations with Panama, and especially the status of the Canal Zone itself, have long symbolized for many in Latin America all that was regrettable about some aspects of the so-called "special relationship" with the United States. All of the attempts by our Government to convince Latin Americans that we respect their rights and understand their interests would ring hollow if we could not bring ourselves to abandon the habits of thought and practice which have been epitomized by the status of the Panama Canal." (Pgs. 121-22, part 3, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

Jorge Dominguez, Associate Professor, Department of Government, Harvard University, linked passage of the treaties to U.S. and Cuban competition for influence in the Hemisphere:

"* * * The United States has demonstrated by this treaty its continued importance to Latin America. This is something the Soviet Union cannot do; this is something Cuba cannot do. And this is also something no other U.S. ally can do. The point may bear an example. I have done a fair amount of work on Cuban foreign policy. In its competition with the United States over influence in Latin America, the Cuban revolutionary government has often called attention to the U.S. failure to agree with Panama on a new canal treaty. These new treaties, therefore, have taken away this argument with one stroke, and have demonstrated to many Latin American governments—including the government of Panama—that it may be more useful for them to work closely with the United States than with any other country, including Cuba." (P. 179, part 3, SFRC Panama Canal Hearings.)

After weighing all of the foreign factors, after considering all of the pros and cons, after pouring over 2,500 pages of testimony from 90 witnesses, the Committee on Foreign Relations finds that the national interest cost benefit analysis overwhelmingly supports ratification of the pending treaties.

Many witnesses who appeared before the Committee presented such an analysis. None was more penetrating or persuasive than that given by former Secretary of State Dean Rusk, as the following key excerpts indicate:

"I begin with the conviction that the treaty of 1903, as amended, offers a very fragile platform on which to try to stand in these closing decades of the 20th century. * * *

Treaties are the primary source of international law partly because they are drafted in relatively precise terms of legal obligation and, more importantly, because they represent the consent of the sovereign parties who agree to them. We cannot seriously suggest that the 1903 treaty represents the consent of Panama or of its people. It would be accurate to say that if the United States were a party to a treaty which became obnoxious to our public policy and repugnant to our people, we would move to denounce it and relieve ourselves of its burdens."

"But let us be under no illusion, an attempt to maintain our position in the Panama Canal Zone on the basis of the 1903 treaty would be an act of force, as in Eastern Europe. We can choose that course if we are prepared to pay the heavy political, economic and military costs involved. * * *

"When the United Nations Security Council met in Panama in 1973 and had before it a resolution on Panama, hostile to U.S. interests, it was necessary for our representative to exercise a veto, with no member of the council voting with us. There were 13 "yes" votes, the U.K. abstained, and the United States cast the only negative vote. Close friends such as France, Australia, Austria, and Kenya voted against us."

"Opponents of these treaties object to our making such arrangements with a dictator. Having been involved with this problem before the present regime in Panama came to power, I would suggest that the more democratic the government in Panama, the more insistent they would be on a prompt and fundamental change in the arrangements regarding the canal."

"* * * Providence has not given us the ability to pierce the fog of the future with accuracy and the year 2000 is a long way off."

"Perhaps we should not, today, try to answer every problem which might be posed to some future President and Congress. I must confess, however, that article IV of the neutrality treaty played a major role in my own decision to support these two treaties. If, God forbid, it should ever become necessary for a President and a Congress to take strong measures to keep the canal functioning and safe, they would, in my judgment, be in a far stronger position to do so under the treaties of 1977 than under the anachronistic treaty of 1903."

"Thus, whether we are thinking of the principles upon which we hope to see a cooperative community of nations move into the future or are thinking about a hardheaded approach to adverse contingencies which may lurk in the future, it seems to me to be to our advantage to give effect to these two new treaties. The consequences of not doing so could be very severe. I see no point in inviting these consequences upon ourselves now when we have a good chance to avoid them altogether." (Pgs. 520-23, part 3, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

These views command attention and respect. They present the Panama issue as rationally, as honestly and as dispassionately as it can be presented—indeed as it must be presented. The testimony of former Secretary Rusk, like numerous other witnesses before him and after him, sweeps away the emotionalism and the outdated symbolism that so many Americans attach to the Panama question and lays bare the cold necessities and realities of the last quarter of the 20th Century.

Secretary BROWN. The canal was built for shipping, not slogans. We seek to guarantee transit of vessels, not theoretical claims of title. These goals we have sought, as I said at the beginning, are practical. The issues before you are practical ones. Our negotiations have obtained instruments which, more certainly than thousands of forces and their armaments on the spot, will assure those practical objectives for generations to come. (P. 98, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings).

General BROWN. I think to describe the United States with this action as proof that the United States is a paper tiger, as this gentleman does, is absolutely wrong.

I think, rather than that, it shows the United States to be enlightened. I think it shows the United States to be determined to live in the world today and not in the world of yesterday. I think it shows that we profit by the experience of the Portuguese in Angola and Mozambique, the French in Algeria and Indochina, and ourselves in the Philippines. We left the Philippines for the same reasons that I think we should renegotiate these. It is in recognition of the importance of the Panama Canal that I feel we should do this because we would then be guaranteed, I think, of a better opportunity and guarantee in the future of the use of the canal. (P. 193, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

Addressing these same considerations, former Secretary Kissinger also helped lay to rest the charge that the Panama treaties are just further evidence of a policy of retreat:

"I recognize the deep feeling of many Americans who wish, after the Vietnam tragedy, to see an end to yielding and retreat by the United States. No one can appreciate such concerns better than one who strove for an honorable outcome during the Vietnam period. But the Canal is not the issue to select to demonstrate that we remain strong and resolute. Panama is the smallest and weakest of nations. We are not 'giving' the Canal to Panama; we are, rather, ensuring our ability to protect it. By taking constructive action now to revise our relationship with Panama in an atmosphere free of physical pressure, while we are still able objectively to assess the longterm risks and benefits, we will be demonstrating fundamental strength, not weaknesses. It is just this ability to distinguish between symbol and reality, to plan for future needs and to take timely action to advance our basic interests, that is the essence of a strong and effective world policy." (P. 523, part 3, SFRC Canal hearings.)

The Committee recognizes that for many Americans the symbol and the reality are one—that the Panama Canal and Canal Zone are as much a part of our heritage as Alaska, Hawaii, or Missouri; that they are as much a part of our technological leadership as computers, rockets, and satellites; that they are as much a part of our national security as missile sites in Montana or naval bases at Pensacola or San Diego; that they are as much a part of our world power status as our military presence in the Pacific or the Mediterranean. But the Committee does not have this luxury. It must distinguish between symbol and reality. For the nation's well-being the Committee's decisions must be based on the present and the future—not the past. Reaching these decisions in the case of Panama has not been easy, but necessary—indeed, vital.

The Committee is convinced that if the public-at-large could devote as much time and energy to this issue as the Committee has, it would arrive at the same conclusion. Since this is not possible or practical, the public will have to rely on judgments rendered by its elected officials. In this instance, it is the Committee's firm judgment that the national interest requires ratification of the Panama agreements; that the symbol and the reality are separate and distinct and that the differences between them are in fact the differences between night and day.

The testimony of William Jorden, United States Ambassador to Panama, graphically portrays these differences by reversing the symbolism in order to highlight the reality:

"Suppose, for example, that history had dictated that the Mississippi River and a strip of territory on each side were controlled by a foreign power. Suppose that in going from Illinois to Missouri, or from Louisiana to Texas you had to cross that strip.

"And imagine, if you will, that you broke the law in some fashion—by speeding or having a tail light out, or whatever—and you were arrested by a French gendarme or a Mexican policeman. It does not take great imagination to know what our reactions would be. Yet that is the situation that our Panamanian friends have found themselves in for the past 70 years. (Pgs. 281-282, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

The example cited by Ambassador Jorden sharply illustrates much of the basic reality of our present treaty relationship with Panama. If the situation were reversed, as the Ambassador suggests, Americans would view the reality of it as at best unacceptable, if not odious. Not surprisingly, Panamanians view it the same way.

In marked contrast, the proposed Panama treaties provide a positive response to a situation, a very real situation, that can no longer endure. Simply put, the treaties resolve a situation that is otherwise untenable. In its place, they hold out the genuine promise of establishing a partnership arrangement that will prove mutually satisfactory, mutually beneficial and mutually rewarding.

In their wisdom, the citizens of Panama have overwhelmingly endorsed that partnership arrangement as proposed in the treaties now before the Senate. The Committee strongly recommends that the United States follow suit and that the Senate give its advice and consent to the Panama Canal treaties.

VI. MAJOR ISSUES

The Panama Canal treaties raise a number of major issues. Most of these issues fall into one of three categories: legal aspects, defense and neutrality, and economic considerations. There follows a discussion of the issues categorized accordingly. In addition, the Committee's view on the sea level canal issue is also contained in this section. Finally, there is a discussion of the human rights issue and the question of any hidden financial commitments.

A. Legal aspects

(1) TRANSFER OF PROPERTY

The Committee has studied carefully the question raised by article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "The Congress shall have power to dispose of * * * the territory or other property belonging to the United States. * * ." The argument has been made that this provision grants to both Houses of the Congress the power to dispose of governmental property, that that power can be exercised only by statute, and that no treaty exercising that power can thus be effective in the absence of implementing legislation.

Whatever the validity of that position, it should be noted at the outset that the issue raised is not whether "concurrent jurisdiction" to dispose of government property resides in the President alone. An 1899 opinion of the Attorney General concluded that the power to dispose of certain governmental lands "cannot be exercised by the executive department of the government." 22 Op. Atty. Gen. 544, 545. The Committee fully concurs. The question, rather, is whether the concurrence of the House of Representatives, in addition to that of the Senate, is constitutionally required.

While reasonable arguments probably can be made for the mandatory inclusion of the House, the Committee believes that the weight of authority supports the conclusion that the constitutional grant of the disposal power to the Congress does not thereby exclude that subject from the treaty power.

Constitutional Text

First, the constitutional text gives no reason to assume that the power to dispose of property may be exercised only by statute, and not by treaty. The disposal-of-property clause is drafted in the same way as the provision conferring enumerated powers upon the Congress (article I, section 8): both say that Congress "shall have power. * * ." Where two substantively similar provisions of the Constitution are in their jurisdictional terms worded identically, and where one of those provisions has been construed as conferring concurrent power, it is not unreasonable to construe the other provision also as conferring concurrent power. It has long been established that article I, section 8 of the Constitution confers concurrent power—that the enumerated powers conferred upon the Congress therein may be exercised both by statute and by treaty. To hold that the enumerated powers are by implication excluded from the treaty power would be to hold that hundreds of self-executing treaties dealing with such subjects as foreign commerce, copyrights, patents, and postal services are invalid. The Constitution on its face presents no reason for regarding the disposal power as different, jurisdictionally, from those powers.

It is true that certain powers cannot constitutionally be exercised by treaty. Enactment of a statute would be required, for example, to appropriate money from the Treasury, or to impose taxes, or to declare war. But exclusive statutory jurisdiction exists in those cases for reasons peculiar to the specific powers in question. A treaty may not impose taxes because the constitutional requirement that all bills raising revenue originate in the House of Representatives (article I, section 7, clause 1) seems clearly to have been intended to include the House in the revenue-raising process. A treaty may not appropriate funds from the Treasury because the language of the appropriations clause, like that of the revenue clause and unlike that of the disposal-of-property clause, does appear to be exclusive: it provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law" (article I, section 9, clause 7). A treaty may not declare war because the unique legislative history of the declaration-of-war clause (article I, section 8, clause 11) clearly indicates that the power was intended to reside jointly in the House of Representatives and the Senate. (See p. 74 of this report.) No such rationale applies to the disposal-of-property clause.

Finally, it seems relevant that the disposal-of-property clause appears in article IV of the Constitution, the article dealing with federal-state and inter-state relations. While by no means conclusive, this placement does suggest an intent to set out a power of the federal government as against the power of the states, rather than a power of the Congress as against the joint power of the Senate and the President.

Intent of the Framers

From all available records it appears that the Framers evidenced no intent to preclude the United States from disposing of governmental property by treaty. They rejected all proposals to limit the treaty power. A review of the discussion of the disposal-of-property clause indicates that the Framers' concern was that the Federal government have primacy over the states in resolving disputes among the states over certain western lands—suggesting, again, an intent to delineate federal power versus that of the states. A number of statements, indicating that territory and other property could be transferred by treaty, were made by the Framers during the debate on the treaty power after article IV was adopted.

Judicial Authorities

The Supreme Court appears to have favored a construction of the Constitution which would permit the disposal of property by self-executing treaty. It is well settled, as the Attorney General noted during the Committee's hearings, that the treaty power extends "to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations", although it does not "extend so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids." Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 266-267 (1890); Asakuru v. Seattle, 265 U.S. 332, 341 (1924). The transfer of property from one nation to another clearly constitutes a proper subject of negotiation; the question is whether the Constitution forbids such transfer by treaty.

A number of cases suggest that it does not. The Court had no problem with several treaties transferring United States property to various Indian tribes. (Prior to the Indian Appropriation Act of 1871, Indian tribes were recognized as independent nations with whom the United States could contract by treaty, and the Court has held that the "power to make treaties with the Indian tribes is . . . co-extensive with that to make treaties with foreign nations." United States v. 43 Gallons of Whiskey, 93 U.S. 188 (1876).) In Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. (84 U.S.) 211 (1872), for example, the Court heard a challenge to a treaty with the Cherokee nation which transferred to it land belonging to the United States. The Court said: ". . . it is insisted that the President and the Senate, in concluding such a treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should be issued to convey lands which belonged to the United States without consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political." Id. at 247.

In Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1 (1899), the Court said that "[t]he title to the strip of land in controversy" had been "granted by the United States to the elder chief Moose Dung by the treaty itself. . . . Id. at 32. The Court also stated as follows: "It is well settled that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States." Id. at 10.

It may be worth pointing out that in a number of cases, occasionally cited for the purpose of showing that the disposal power is unlimited, the Court discussed the scope of the disposal power in the context of federal power versus states rights; no treaties were involved. See, e.g., Alabama v. Texas, 347 U.S. 272 (1954); Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496 (1890).

While additional cases are cited on each side of the question, the Committee sees little merit in attempting to weigh dicta against dicta. The short of it is that the Court has never struck down a treaty for disposing of governmental property; that it has, over the years, had before it a number of treaties which did so; and that there is no reason to assume that Holden v. Joy, supra, and Jones v. Meehan, supra, do not represent the Court's thinking.

Historical Precedent

As the Committee has noted in the past, it does not believe that a constitutionally questionable practice, by mere repetition, becomes more constitutional, S. Rept. 94-605, January 30, 1975 (94th Congress, 2nd Session) at 15. The Constitution is not amended by violation; express prohibitions and requirements, such as those contained in the declaration-of-war clause, the treaty clause, and the disposal-of-property clause, are not expunged through non-observance. Nonetheless, historical precedent can be useful for corroborative purposes—not to show what the Constitution has become or what it should be, but rather as evidence that a given construction of that document is grounded on experience as well as logic. It is for that at purpose that the Committee notes the following instances in which property belonging to the United States Government has, according to the Executive Branch, been transferred by treaty.

[Supplied by Department of State]

The following list includes treaties which are couched in self-executing terms and transfer territory or property belonging to the United States to other nations or (in the case of Indian treaties) to specific individuals without prior Congressional act authorizing such transfer.

A. Treaties With Indian Tribes

1. An example of a treaty with an Indian tribe providing for the transfer to the tribe of title to lands belonging to the United States without prior Congressional authorization is the treaty with the Cherokee Nation of December 29, 1835.
2. An example of a treaty with an Indian tribe conveying land to an Indian individual without act of Congress is the treaty with the Chippewa Indians of October 2, 1863.

B. Treaties with Foreign Nations¹

1. Treaty between the United States and Spain, February 22, 1819 (12 Bevans 528).
2. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, August 9, 1842 (Webster-Ashburton Treaty) (12 Bevans 82).
3. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, June 15, 1846 (Oregon Boundaries) (11 Bevans 95).
4. Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, February 1, 1933 (Rectification of the Rio Grande in El Paso-Juarez Valley) (9 Bevans 976).
5. Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, August 29, 1963 (Solution of the Chamizal Problem) (15 U.S.T.21).
6. Treaty between the United States and the United Mexican States, November 23, 1970 (Maintenance of the Rio Grande and Colorado River as International Boundary) (23 U.S.T.371).
7. Treaty between the United States and Honduras, November 22, 1971 (Swan Islands) (23 U.S.T.2631).
8. Treaty between the United States and Japan, June 17, 1971 (Reversion of Ryukyu and Daito Islands) (23 U.S.T. 447).²
9. Treaty between the United States and Panama, January 25, 1955 (Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation), Articles VI³ and VII (6 U.S.T.2283).

Conclusion

The Committee finds that the constitutional text, the intent of the Framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation. This conclusion is in full accord with the opinion of the Attorney General that "[t]erritory or property belonging to the United States may be disposed of by action of the President and the Senate under the treaty clause."—Op. Atty. Gen.—(1977); see hearings, part 1, pp. 199-203.

² The treaty provisions are drafted in self-executing language. Some property may have been transferred in reliance in 40 USC 511 and 512.

³ Effectiveness of Article VI was postponed until withdrawal from certain sections in the City of Colon, but the Memorandum of Understandings attached to the Treaty recognized that the transfers subject to legislative authorization were "in addition * * * to the transfer of real property affected by Article VI of the Treaty."

(2) SOVEREIGNTY

Much confusion has surrounded the illusive concept of sovereignty and the issue of what sovereign interests the United States possesses in the Canal Zone. Whatever the term implies, and whatever such interests the United States holds, it seems clear that the phrase "territory . . . belonging to the United States" subsumes land over which the United States exercises sovereign power, and that the disposal-of-property clause, discussed above, empowers the United States to transfer sovereignty as well as common law property rights. The Committee does not therefore believe that the issue of sovereignty—as a strictly legal matter—is relevant to the Canal debate. The United States can legally transfer its interests; the question is whether as a matter of policy it should.

To whatever extent it is relevant, it appears that the United States does not possess sovereignty over the Canal Zone. "Sovereignty," broadly defined, is the ultimate power to exercise governmental functions within a particular territory. The Committee believes, based on the terms of the 1903 and 1936 treaties with Panama and court decisions, that Panama has always maintained titular sovereignty over that territory. The United States has held certain rights to exercise certain attributes of sovereignty, but those rights are distinguishable from the underlying sovereign interest of Panama over the Canal Zone.

Article III of the 1903 Treaty with Panama provides that the United States has " . . . all the rights, power and authority within the Zone . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power of authority."

In his testimony before the Committee on September 26, 1977, Ambassador Linowitz, referring to Article III of the 1903 Treaty, noted that "If we had sovereignty we would not have needed the words that we have certain rights . . . to act as if it were the sovereign." As Ambassador Bunker put it, "We have had rights, but not sovereignty."

Article III of the 1936 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Panama states that the Canal Zone is "the territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States."

One oft-quoted case, cited for the proposition that the United States has somehow acquired sovereign rights, is Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 (1907). In that case, the Court said that—

" . . . it is hyper-critical to contend the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong, to this nation, because of omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real property."

The real question in Wilson, however, was not which nation possessed sovereignty but rather whether the United States had sufficient interest and authority in the Zone to expend funds for the construction of the Canal. The Supreme Court found that the grant of authority in the 1903 Treaty was sufficient. The limits of the Court's holding were pointed out by the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone that same year in Canal Zone v. Coulson, Canal Zone Supreme Court Reports 50 (1907), in which the defendants contended that the Court in Wilson had held that the Canal Zone was the territory of the United States and that therefore, the Constitution applied in the Zone. The court rejected this contention and stated as follows:

"The Supreme Court did not hold more in that case [Wilson] than that the United States had the use, occupation and control in perpetuity of the Canal Zone. It is apparent from an examination of the treaty that the United States is not the owner in fee of the Canal Zone, but has the use, occupation and control of the same in perpetuity so long as they comply with the terms of the treaty. . . ."

The Court went on to conclude that the rights of the United States in the Canal Zone were not such as to render the Constitution applicable.

In Vermilya-Brown Co. Inc. v. Connel, 335 U.S. 377 (1948), the Supreme Court was called upon to determine the status of certain United States military bases in Bermuda. The Court compared these bases to the Canal Zone, which the Court said was "admittedly territory over which we do not have sovereignty." The Court found that the ability of Congress to legislate depended not upon sovereignty, but upon control.

A variety of the other indices of sovereignty suggest that sovereignty over the Zone lies in the Government of Panama. In contrast to the sovereignty acquired by the United States through the purchases of the Louisiana Territory or Alaska, the United States did not acquire sovereignty; it acquired, under the 1903 Treaty, the use, occupation and control of the Canal Zone. This is made even more clear by the fact that the United States has made annual payments for privileges acquired in the Canal Zone—as contrasted with territories over which this country acquired full sovereign interest. Principles of “citizenship by birth” are not applicable in the Canal Zone; a person born in the Canal Zone to parents who are not citizens of the United States would not be a U.S. citizen, as that person would be were he born in the United States, the Virgin Islands, Guam, or some other United States possession or territory. In addition, the Canal Zone is not listed by the Department of State as a territory or dependency in reports by the United States to the United Nations. Finally, the United States has allowed Panama to display its flag within the Zone, to collect income taxes within the Zone, and to exercise customs and immigration functions within the Zone.

For all these reasons: therefore, the Committee agrees with the Attorney General that “the Republic of Panama retained titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone”—although as noted above it does not regard that fact as a matter of legal consequence.

(3) RELATION TO OTHER TREATY RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES

The Committee also has given careful consideration to the effect these treaties may have on the rights and obligations of the United States arising under other pertinent treaties, specifically, the United Nations Charter, the Charter of the Organization of American States, the Rio Treaty, and the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901. Its conclusion is that no inconsistency exists between these treaties and the two now before the Senate, for the following reasons:

U.N. Charter

Three provisions of the United Nations Charter appear relevant:

Article 2, clause 4 of the United Nations Charter provides as follows:

4. All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Article 51 provides in pertinent part as follows:

Article 51

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Article 103 of the United Nations Charter provides as follows:

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

As to article 2, clause 4, the Committee notes that the Joint Statement of October 14, 1977, addresses this question directly. It provides that—

Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the Canal shall remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

The Administration's elaboration to the Committee (p. 332, hearings, part 1) makes clear that no inconsistency exists:

A legitimate exercise of rights under the Neutrality Treaty by the United States would not, either in intent or in fact, be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama. No question of detaching territory from the sovereignty or jurisdiction of Panama would arise. Nor would the political independence of Panama be violated by measures calculated to uphold a commitment to the maintenance of the Canal's neutrality which Panama has freely assumed. A use of force in these circumstances would not be directed against the form or character or composition of the Government of Panama or any other aspect of its political independence; it would be solely directed and proportionately crafted to maintain the neutrality of the Canal. Such a use of force in support of the Canal's neutrality would be consistent with the purpose of the United Nations.

As to Article 51 of the Charter, the Committee agrees with the Executive Branch (p. 333, hearings, part 1) that—

... action by the United States in defense of its rights [under Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty] is not subject to preconditions and the United States may act until the Security Council has taken necessary measures to maintain peace.

As to Article 103, since no conflict exists between the obligations of the United States under the Panama Canal Treaties and its obligations under the United Nations Charter, the Committee sees no inconsistency.

The OAS Charter

Article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States, which seems particularly relevant, provides as follows:

Article 18

No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever in the internal or external affairs of any other State. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the State or against its political, economic, and cultural elements.

The Committee again concurs with the position of the Executive Branch that this provision is not inconsistent with the rights of the United States under the Neutrality Treaty. That position (P. 332, hearings, part 1) is as follows:

... Action conforming with the proposed treaty would not be interference in the internal affairs of Panama because being the subject of a treaty obligation, the matters embraced by the Neutrality Treaty are not the internal affairs of either State party to that treaty. Nor would action in implementation of Article IV be an intervention in Panama's external affairs; it would relate to Panama's external affairs in that action would be based on an international obligation of Panama. It would not, however, be "intervention" any more than reliance upon and implementation of a treaty right by one State and invocation of the corresponding treaty obligation of another ever is "intervention." Equally, performance of Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty would not be directed against the "personality of [Panama] or against its political, economic and cultural elements," but rather toward maintenance of the neutrality of the Canal.

The Rio Treaty

Article I of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (the "Rio Treaty") provides as follows:

The High Contracting Parties formally condemn war and undertake in their international relations not to resort to the threat or the use of force in any manner inconsistent with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations or of this Treaty.

Since no use of force (as described above) would be inconsistent with the provisions of the United Nations Charter, no inconsistency exists between this article and the Neutrality Treaty.

Hay-Pauncefote Treaty

The additional question has been raised whether Article VI of the Neutrality Treaty, which relates among other things to the right to expeditious transit, would place the United States in violation of the 1901 Hay-Pauncefote Treaty with Great Britain. Article 3, paragraph 1 of that Treaty provides as follows:

1. The Canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these Rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges or traffic shall be just and equitable.

Inasmuch as the United States has taken the position that no third countries have acquired rights as third party beneficiaries under the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, there thus being no third-country rights which might be abridged, the question is simply whether entry into force of the Neutrality Treaty would place the United States in violation of a treaty obligation with the United Kingdom. The Committee has been advised by the Department of State that it has consulted Her Majesty's Government concerning the relationship between these two treaties two treaties and that Her Majesty's Government "has confirmed that it agrees that the proposed Neutrality Treaty is consistent with the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty."

(4) WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

Section 8(a) (2) of the War Powers Resolution provides as follows:

"Sec. 8(a) Authority to introduce United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations wherein involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances shall not be inferred * * * from any treaty heretofore or hereafter ratified unless such treaty is implemented by legislation specifically authorizing the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into such situations and stating that it is intended to constitute specific statutory authorization within the meaning of this joint resolution."

In the absence of the Joint Statement, article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, which commits the United States "to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this treaty," would appear to have committed United States to take such action—including the introduction of its Armed Forces into hostilities—as may be necessary to maintain the neutrality of the Canal. Thus, the United States would have been committed internationally to a course of action which under its domestic law it has expressly retained the right not to take.

This problem, about which a number of committee members expressed concern, was eliminated through the insertion of the Joint Statement by President Carter and President Torrijos on October 14. That statement provides that the defense of the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality will be carried out by each country "in accordance with their respective constitutional processes." The effect of this language is to make clear that the treaty does not obligate the United States to introduce its Armed Forces into hostilities or authorize the President to do so. It thus places the Neutrality Treaty, in terms of the "automaticity" of the United States' international commitment, in the same category as mutual defense treaties to which the United States is a party. All such treaties implicitly reserve to the United States a right of choice in each individual situation to act, militarily, as it deems appropriate under the circumstances. Any treaty which did not do so would, in the Committee's judgment, unconstitutionally divest the House of Representatives of its share of the warmaking power and would, unconstitutionally, delegate to the President the power to place the United States at war. The amendment recommended by the Committee to article IV would obviate these difficulties by rendering the United States' commitment non-automatic, as is the commitment under article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty.

(5) MISCELLANEOUS LEGAL MATTERS

Third-party rights

The question has arisen whether third countries will derive rights under the treaties either through accession (to the Protocol to the Neutrality Treaty) or through the creation of third party beneficiaries.

The Committee concurs with the Executive Branch that no such rights are created in third countries. Customary international law requires that the parties to a treaty intend to accord a right to a third state before a right is created. "Nothing in either treaty evidences such an intent," according to the Department of State. "In fact, it was the clear intent of both parties that no third party rights be conferred." Letter of Herbert J. Hansell, Legal Adviser, Department of State, to Michael J. Glennon, Legal Counsel, Committee on Foreign Relations, January 26, 1978 (hearings, part 5).

Status of Forces Agreements

The Committee wishes to make clear that the Agreements in Implementation of Articles III and IV of the Panama Canal Treaty will be entered into pursuant to the authority of that treaty, and not pursuant to the President's constitutional authority. The Committee is pleased to note that the Department of State does not claim "inherent" authority on the part of the President to conclude these agreements. Letter to Herbert J. Hansell, supra.

C. Economic Considerations

In response to the Committee's request of January 20, 1978, for additional economic and financial data, the State Department provided the following information on February 3, 1978.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
February 3, 1978.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Attached to this letter you will find some additional economic and financial data concerning the operation of the Panama Canal. We are supplying this data in response to the request made by the Committee as a result of the hearing held on January 20, 1978.

We hope that this material helps to clarify some of the questions which arose during the hearing and stand ready to supply any additional information the Committee may need.

Sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS J. BENNETT, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary of State
for Congressional Relations.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE NEW PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

This paper summarizes research on the ability of the Panama Canal to be operationally self-sustaining until the end of the century and examines the implications of the Panama Canal Treaty on domestic and world commerce.

Research performed by the U.S. treaty negotiating team, by independent consultants and by various U.S. Government departments indicates that:

1. The Canal enterprise can generate sufficient revenue under the basic treaty to cover all its costs.
2. Opportunities for toll increases substantially exceed the revenues which will be required.
3. Cost savings opportunities are substantial.
4. The impact of likely toll increases on domestic and world commerce will be minimal, if not negligible.

CAN THE CANAL PRODUCE SUFFICIENT REVENUE UNDER THE NEW TREATY TO COVER COSTS?

Since 1915 toll revenues have risen from $4 million to $165 million in fiscal year 1977. At current toll levels they will increase to $210 million in 1985 and to $224 million in 1990. With a modest 25 percent toll increase, revenues would increase to $251 million in 1985 and to $268 million in 1990.

At the same time various estimates have been made of the Panama Canal Commission's operating costs. An exhaustive study on Panama Commission cost projects has just been prepared by Arthur Anderson & Company for the 1979-83 period. These projections conclude that Canal costs, including payments to Panama and including an inflation factor, will range between $241 million and $249 million in 1979 to between $237 million and $262 million in 1983.

The most significant impact of the new Treaties on future Canal financial operations will be the several annual payments to Panama which will be funded out of Canal operating revenues as operating Canal expenditures of the new Panama Canal Commission.

Article XIII of the Treaty specifies three annual payments to Panama from Canal revenues as an equitable return to Panama on the national resources it has provided the Canal. The first payment is calculated on the basis of 30 cents per Panama Canal ton for each vessel transiting the Canal. Five years after the Treaty goes into effect, this payment will be adjusted every two years to reflect changes in the wholesale price index. This payment should cost the Panama Canal Commission about $45 million in fiscal year 1979. This payment is a direct result of Canal traffic and would not, of course, be paid if the Canal were not operating.

The Panama Canal Commission will also pay Panama a fixed annuity of $10 million out of Canal operating revenues. This payment is a fixed expense of the Company and is not a function of traffic.

The Commission will also pay Panama a third annuity of up to $10 million only to the extent the Commission has a surplus. Should the Canal's revenues not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this contingent payment, the unpaid balance would be paid from future year surpluses.

Any unpaid balance remaining at the expiration of the Treaty would not represent a liability to the United States. Since this payment is only a contingent obligation, the Panama Canal Commission is not required to reflect it in its budget or the toll base.

In addition, Article III of the Treaty which is discussed in greater detail below requires an annual payment of $10 million for specified public services furnished by Panama in Commission operating and housing areas. This reimbursement is for public services which currently cost the U.S. Government approximately $18 million to perform.

Governor Parfitt, speaking for the Panama Canal Company, has suggested that an initial toll increase of 19.6 percent over existing rates would be required to meet these costs. However, the Governor pointed out a similar toll increase would be necessary by 1981 even without the treaties. American Management Services Commission has suggested an initial toll increase of 25 percent. The State Department in its initial estimates and testimony had suggested a toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 to 40 percent which subsequent study indicates was excessively conservative.

A study on Canal traffic and revenue forecasts recently completed by International Research Associates offers estimates that are more optimistic than those developed by our negotiating staff during the actual treaty negotiations. The study concludes that:

(a) Tolls could be increased up to slightly over 100 percent before revenues would begin to decline.

(b) Toll rate increases ranging from 15 percent to 50 percent would result in losses of traffic, on a tonnage basis, ranging from 2.4 percent for a 15 percent increase to 11.8 percent for a 50 percent increase.

Various studies concur in the finding that an initial toll increase is well within the ability of the Canal to generate revenue through tolls.

This was our judgment during the negotiations. It is a judgment which has been supported by all subsequent analyses with which we are familiar, including the IRA study, a study of Commission costs by Arthur Anderson, and the findings of the Armed Services Committee consultant whose report was issued by the Armed Services Committee on February 1.

WHAT COST SAVINGS WILL BE EFFECTED?

Since 1951, the Panama Canal Company has been administered as a self-sustaining U.S. Government corporation. Currently, in addition to the Canal, annual costs funded by Canal revenues include the Canal Zone Government, Canal Company retail and commercial operations, an "interest" payment to the Treasury of $18 to $20 $500,000 of the $2.3 million annuity paid to Panama under the 1903 treaty.

In addition to the requirement to provide payments to Panama, the cost structure of the Panama Canal operation will be changed significantly by the new treaty.

The costs of the Canal Zone Government (about $25 million per year) will disappear after a 30 month transition period. In addition, all commercial and retail facilities will no longer be part of the Canal operation. Costs of providing schools and hospitals for Canal Zone employees will be reimbursed from toll revenues, as is now the case.

The new treaty provides that the Commission pay Panama $10 million per year in return for public services provided by Panama in the Canal operating and housing areas. This cost will be in contrast to the costs currently paid of approximately $18 million.

The Executive Branch will specifically recommend to Congress that the legislation organizing the Panama Canal Commission not charge it with an annual "interest" payment to the Treasury of $18 to $20 million. Congress, however, can decide to include an interest payment in the cost base to be covered by increased tolls. The Congress should recognize that it has always been the policy of the United States to operate the Canal as a public service and that this interest charge is in some ways a departure from this concept.

Beyond these cost savings, American Management Services has reviewed planning budgets for the Panama Canal operation and has considered reductions proposed in connection with the reduced scope of activity of the Panama Canal Commission versus the Panama Canal Company. The American Management Study reported that cost reductions, even larger than those envisioned by the Company, could be made.

WHAT WILL BE THE IMPACT OF THE TREATIES ON DOMESTIC AND WORLD COMMERCE?

Since 1914, the Panama Canal has served world commerce as an important transportation route. Canal traffic has risen from 5 million Panama tons in 1915 to 123 million Panama Canal tons in fiscal year 1977. The IRA study indicates that traffic will further increase to 201.9 million tons by the year 2000.

Canal toll rates, however, have remained at low levels. They have changed very little over the years despite mammoth price changes for just about everything else. In 1914, tolls were set at $1.20 per laden Panama Canal ton, and changed to 90 cents per laden ton in 1937. Since 1974, there have been increases in toll rates of 50 percent. Tolls today are set at $1.29 per laden ton.

A toll increase of 20 to 30 percent over existing levels will have a minimum, if not negligible, impact on our trade and economy. A toll increase of about 30 percent will involve a transportation cost increase of less than one percent. Users of the Canal would pay only about $50 million more in tolls per year on cargoes that have a value in excess of roughly $50 billion, or one-tenth of one percent. In most instances, it will be the foreign buyer of U.S. commodities transiting the Canal who is the ultimate payer of Canal tolls and not the seller or shipper. Therefore, of the $50 million, U.S. businesses and consumers will be the ultimate payers of only about $15 million. The overall impact of this on a $1.7 trillion economy is negligible on either our business or the purchasing power of the consumer.

Obviously, there are uncertainties with respect to Panama Canal traffic and revenue, especially after 1990. The same is true of any projection of world or national economic conditions. These uncertainties would exist whether or not we undertake a new treaty relationship with Panama. The new treaty will provide a stable environment, while the alternative of continuing the present relationship could almost certainly involve greater costs and uncertainty for shippers.

Sea level canal provision and related issues

The size of ships which can transit the Panama Canal is limited by the capacity of the three sets of locks. Maximum size of ships is approximately 975 feet in length; 106 feet in width; with a 40 feet draft and a weight of 65,000 dead weight tons. The locks are filed by gravity flow and each transit through the Canal requires 52 million gallons of water.

Approximately 2,000 commercial vessels, primarily bulk cargo carriers and tankers, and 13 U.S. naval vessels are too large to transit the Canal. The Department of Transportation expects the number of commercial vessels too large to transit the Canal to increase. In addition, the Tokyo Bay class of ships may not be able to transit the Canal fully loaded according to DOT, and the transit time is longer for such large ships. The report of the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission stated that by the year 2000, 6 percent of bulk cargo carriers and 23 percent of tankers will be over 100,000 dead weight tons, and thus will be too large to transit the Canal. By 2040, the number of bulk carriers in excess of 100,000 DWT. will be 15 percent and 70 percent of all tankers will be too large to use the present Canal.

The increase in the size of ships indicates a potential need to increase the capacity of the Canal. Two major methods of increasing Canal capacity, a sea level canal or a third lane of larger locks for the Panama Canal, were considered by the Atlantic-Pacific Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission.

Article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty

In article XII of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, the U.S. and Panama recognize that a sea level canal may be necessary in the future. The U.S. and Panama commit themselves to study jointly the need for and feasibility of a new sea level canal. Should a sea level canal in Panama be found desirable, the Parties will negotiate terms for its construction. Article XII also gives the U.S. the right to construct a third lane of locks at any time during the life of the Treaty if Panama is provided with a set of the plans.

Article XII, paragraph 2 contains restrictions on both the United States and Panama with respect to the construction of a sea level canal. Under paragraph 2(a), the United States has the sole authority to build a sea level canal in Panama until the year 2000, and the U.S. would have to agree to waive this option before a third nation could construct a canal. In exchange for this option, the U.S. agreed to paragraph 2(b) which will prevent the U.S. from concluding an agreement to construct a sea level canal any place else in the Western Hemisphere without the agreement of Panama until the year 2000.

The United States requested that the provisions of article XII, paragraph 2(a) be included because the construction and control of a sea level canal in Panama by a third nation could be detrimental to our national security and economic well-being. The Committee considered this question carefully and determined that this provision was a major benefit to the United States. Accordingly, the Committee decided to recommend strongly against adoption of an amendment to delete this important provision.

In arriving at its conclusion, the Committee determined that despite some questions about the terminology of paragraph 2(a), that the provisions of this subparagraph do form a binding commitment on the Republic of Panama. Panama commits itself not to allow the construction of a sea level canal by a third nation or consortium of nations unless the United States agrees to such action.

The language of paragraph 2(a) does differ from that of paragraph 2(b) and it has been contended that the restriction on Panama is less specific than that on the United States. Paragraph 2(a) states that no new interoceanic canal can be constructed in Panama except pursuant to the Treaty without the agreement of the United States. This language is sufficiently binding since the preceding paragraph of article XII clearly says that the United States and Panama will jointly determine the feasibility of a sea level canal and negotiate for its construction. The provisions of paragraph 2(a) have to be read in the context of the entire article and particularly of paragraph 1 since that paragraph says that it will be the United States and Panama, and not some third party, that will negotiate for the construction of a sea level canal in Panama.

To gain this exclusive option for the United States, our negotiators found it necessary to give Panama assurance that the United States would not conclude an agreement for a sea level canal route elsewhere until the expiration of the Treaty. The Committee determined that this quid pro quo was reasonable and acceptable to the United States. In reality, the United States has gained an option important to its national security without giving up a real alternative. The Committee believes the interests of the United States are well served by this paragraph.

Since the restriction on the United States did form part of the basis of the exchange of commitments and since this exchange is beneficial to the United States, the Committee recommends that no amendment to strike out this part of article XII, paragraph 2 be adopted by the Senate.

The restriction on negotiations for a route outside Panama is not a major concession by the United States, because the preferred routes, as determined by the Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission, for a sea level canal are all located in Panama. They are:

(a) Route 10, which would be approximately 10 miles west of the present Canal and which would not interfere in the operation of the Canal; and

(b) Routes 14C and 14S, which vary only slightly, would follow generally the course of the present Canal and would, therefore, interfere in the operation of the present Canal.

Other routes that have been considered across Nicaragua, Costa Rica or Colombia would, to be economically feasible, require nuclear excavation, which is an unproven method that probably would be objectionable to the nations where the sea-level canal might be constructed. The Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission estimated that Route 10 would cost $2.88 billion in 1970 dollars while the major Nicaraguan route would require $11 billion using non-nuclear means. Nuclear excavation of the Nicaragua route would cost $5 billion, but would require relocation of over 500,000 people.

In his testimony before the Committee, Colonel John P. Sheffey, who served as Executive Director of the Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission said:

"* * * I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new Isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama." (P. 515, part 4, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

Colonel Sheffey stated further:

"When we entered this study in 1965, one of our purposes was to prove that we could build a canal, a technically satisfactory canal, outside Panama because it would give us far better negotiating leverage to renegotiate our relationship with Panama.

"We spent $22 million of the taxpayers' money in 5 years and proved only that we could not build outside Panama." (P. 521, part 4, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

The opinion of the Department of Transportation was expressed by Mr. Edward Scott, Assistant Secretary for Administration before the Committee on Foreign Relations on September 30, 1977, Mr. Scott said:

"* * * That Commission [The Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission] is the one which came to these conclusions, but everyone who has reviewed the work comes to the same conclusions, and I personally, and the Department [of Transportation], do not consider it a defect that the treaty commits us to building in Panama because that is the place to build and there is no question about it whatever." (P. 347, part 1, SFRC Panama Canal hearings.)

In 1914, the U.S. ratified the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty with Nicaragua which gave the U.S. an option in perpetuity to construct a canal across Nicaragua. This option in perpetuity came to be resented by Nicaraguans and the Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission recommended against a Nicaraguan route for a sea level canal in 1970. Accordingly, in 1971, the U.S. Senate by a vote of 66 to 5 gave its advice and consent to a treaty terminating the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty of 1914 and the option on a Nicaraguan route.

The third lane of locks alternative would be cheaper to construct, costing about three-fifths of a sea-level canal at Route 10. However, each transit through the Canal using the larger locks would require approximately 100 million gallons of water and a lock canal slows transit time. The Chagres River and Gatun Lake do not have the capacity to provide the amount of water necessary for the operation of a third lane of larger locks, and water would probably have to be pumped up from the ocean to operate the locks. With the smaller locks in use at present, water is already a problem. During dry periods, the draft of vessels using the Canal is limited. Pumping such a large amount of water would be very expensive and a third lane, although cheaper to build, could be substantially more costly to operate.

The construction of a larger third lane of locks under the Deep Draft Lock Canal Plan would allow the transit of ships of approximately 150,000 deadweight tons. Such a system would enable the Canal to compete with alternative means of commercial shipping, but such a lock system still could not handle the U.S. Navy's aircraft carriers.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has not attempted to make decisions on the construction of a sea level canal, a third lane of locks or on which sea level canal route in Panama is most desirable. Such decisions would have to be made only upon extensive analysis of the complex economic and scientific issues as was done by the Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission. However, the Committee has determined, based on the 1970 Report of the Inter-Oceanic Canal Commission and the termination of our option in Nicaragua, that the consideration of alternatives should logically be confined to Panama for the period until the year 2000. The Committee believes that the proposed Panama Canal Treaty and the options it contains are sufficient to protect the interests of the United States in the alternative methods of improving inter-oceanic canal service during the life of the Treaty.

VII. COMMITTEE ACTION

President Carter, on behalf of the United States, signed the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality of the Canal on September 7, 1977, at the headquarters of the Organization of American States in Washington, D.C. The treaties and accompanying documents were transmitted to the Senate on September 16 and referred the same day to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Committee held public hearings on these treaties in September and October 1977 and in January 1978. During the hearing process, the Committee received testimony from more than 90 witnesses and compiled a five-part hearing record totaling some 2,500 pages. In addition, at the Committee's request the Library of Congress prepared an extensive 1700-page publication entitled, "Background Documents Relating to the Panama Canal," plus a complementary publication entitled, "Chronology of Events Relating to the Panama Canal."

Chairman Sparkman led the group which included Senators Case, Church, Javits, Pell, Percy and Sarbanes. Other members of the Committee have also visited Panama in recent months. Senator McGovern visited Panama during the period December 3 to 6. Senator Pearson was there December 12 to 13 and Senator Baker, the Minority Leader, was in Panama January 3 to 7. Following the Majority Leader's appearance before the Committee on January 26, the Committee proceeded to begin mark-up of the treaties. Additional mark-up sessions were held on January 27 and 30. On January 30, the Committee ordered the treaties favorably reported to the Senate for its advice and consent.

The Committee acted first on the resolution of ratification to accompany the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. It approved this resolution by vote of 14-1. Voting in favor were Senators Sparkman, Church, Pell, McGovern, Clark, Biden, Glenn, Stone, Sarbanes, Case, Javits, Pearson, Percy, and Baker. Senator Griffin voted in the negative.

The Committee then acted on the resolution of ratification to accompany the Panama Canal Treaty. It approved this resolution also by a vote of 14-1. Voting in the affirmative were Senators Sparkman, Church, Pell, McGovern, Clark, Biden, Glenn, Stone, Sarbanes, Case, Javits, Pearson, Percy, and Baker. Senator Griffin voted in the negative. The Committee conditioned its approval of this resolution of ratification on Senate approval of the resolution of ratification to the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Canal.

The members of the Committee wish to note at this point the strong support given to the treaties by their former esteemed colleague Senator Hubert Humphrey. Senator Humphrey was one of the first members of the Senate to announce publicly his support for the agreements. He made that announcement on September 7, 1977, the day the treaties were formally signed. The statement released by Senator Humphrey is reprinted below:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

I have followed this issue very carefully and discussed the treaties with the President by telephone. I have pledged to the President my full and active support for the treaties. An important goal of these negotiations has been the establishment of a modern and mutually acceptable treaty relationship between the United States and Panama which provides for the efficient operation of the important waterway that will continue to remain open to all of the world's shipping.

This has been the bipartisan goal for four Presidents, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter, who above all others have the responsibility for the national security of our country. The United States has lost nothing through these treaties. We have not given up anything. Clearly, no international relationship negotiated more than 70 years ago can be expected to last forever without adjustment.

In sum, the new treaties, based on partnership, give the United States the rights we need to restore the crucial ingredient of Panamanian consent and strengthens our mutual interest in a well-run and secure canal. The viability of any treaty depends on the underlying consent and shared interests of nations who are party to it.

Panama and our Latin American neighbors long have been dissatisfied with the 1903 treaty. This declining level of consent transcends any one government and now encompasses Panamanians of all strata.

There are some who claim that the proposed treaties will have an adverse effect on our security. However, the Panama Canal issue affects our relationships with other Latin American nations who view it as a test case of whether or not the United States will move into a more mature relationship with our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere.

Senate approval of the treaties will add substance and character to the good neighbor policy first enunciated by President Roosevelt.

But in my view the case is just the opposite. The 1903 treaty is viewed abroad as one-sided and anachronistic, a holdover from a colonial era which other nations have discarded.

The ability of the United States to work through this emotion-fraught issue at home through ratification of the treaties in the Senate will be viewed abroad by friend and foe alike as a sign that we can make necessary accommodations to a changing world.

In essence, a new treaty relationship based on the concept of partnership and similar to other agreements with our allies throughout the world offers a tool that will better protect our basic interests.

COMMON MISCONCEPTIONS

(Prepared by the Department of State)

1. We are paying Panama to take the Canal.

Most opponents agree that Panama which contributes its location (its principal resource) deserves a larger return for the use of its territory. Payments to Panama, which end in 1999, will come exclusively from Canal users through tolls—not from tax dollars. We built the Canal to use; the new treaties protect our continued use of it forever.

2. We will lose our ability to protect the Canal.

The treaties give us permanent authority to take any action to protect the Canal against any threat. The Joint Chiefs of Staff worked closely with our negotiators; they believe the new treaties will safeguard our defense interests for the future far better than the old treaty would.

3. The treaties are a sellout of our global responsibilities.

No. They show a world leader recognizing changing times and moving to better secure its interests for the future. Our principal allies—West Germany, France, Great Britain, and Japan—support the treaties.

4. We have sovereignty now.

No. We have never claimed sovereignty. For example, we have always treated the Zone as foreign territory for purposes of customs and mail, and children born there of non-US citizens are not US citizens. The 1903 treaty gives us rights “as if sovereign.” We give up only the “trappings of sovereignty” which we no longer need.

5. We own the Canal Zone.

Under the 1903 treaty we bought rights, not land, and we continue to make annual payments for these rights. The titles we have to a part of the Zone we got subsequent to the treaty from private holders, not Panama.

6. The treaties will lead to Cuban/Soviet presence.

An unlikely possibility since we’ll remain there until the year 2000; we’ll continue to have a permanent right to protect the Canal from all threats; and Panama has agreed that no foreign troops will ever be stationed there after 1999. Communism is unlikely to flourish among Panamanians unless we push them toward it.

7. Panama is unreliable and unfriendly.

We have close relations with Panama. For 75 years Panama has honored a treaty it has long resented as depriving it of national dignity and a fair return on its principal resource, the isthmus. Surely it is reasonable to expect that future governments will honor treaties that give Panama partnership in the enterprise and restore its dignity.

8. Torrijos is disreputable and unreliable.

Torrijos is controversial, but signing a treaty with him does not mean that we endorse him personally. In any case, we will operate and defend the Canal for 22 more years and it is unlikely that Torrijos will be in power then.

9. The Torrijos government violates human rights.

Panama is aware of our concern about some of its practices and has acted to modify some of its objectionable laws. In any event, we should treat human rights and the Canal issue separately, as does Freedom House which criticizes Panama’s human rights record, but supports the treaties.

10. The Torrijos government is anti-Semitic.

Panama’s Jewish community leaders have categorically denied the charge. There is no basis to it.

11. Panama and Libya have agreed to make Panama a base for Arab terrorist activities in this hemisphere.

Not so. Their agreements were routine and reflect no special relationship between the two countries. Indeed, Torrijos’ recent visit to Israel has strained relations with Libya.

12. We should not sign any treaty with a dictatorship like the Torrijos government.
The feeling by Panamanians of all political persuasions that the present arrangement is unfair and unjust is quite independent of the current leadership in either Washington or Panama. Panama's plebiscite shows strong public support for a treaty.

13. We need perpetuity.

In 1903 a permanent U.S. presence seem necessary to eradicate disease, construct and operate the canal. (The canal area was disease-ridden and still a jungle frontier.) But by 1965 this presence no longer seemed necessary in perpetuity and under the new treaties, this presence would end in the year 2000. What we still need permanently is access to the canal, and this the new treaties establish.

14. We negotiated under duress.

While the United States is a super power, Panama is a very small country. As President Carter has said, we consider the canal to be important, and we will take whatever action is necessary to protect it. Panama understands.

15. Panama lacks the technical capacity to operate the canal.

Seventy-five percent of present canal employees are Panamanians. In the 22 years before Panama takes over operation, Panamanians will receive the training and experience to operate the canal efficiently. Self-interest will give Panama the incentive to develop the needed skills.

16. Tolls will rise precipitously.

Experts estimate only about 30 percent. This will mean an immediate increase of about $60 million in payments by users for goods that gross about $40 billion in annual sales. Thus, the increase in delivered cost for most commodities would be less than one percent. The U.S. will set the tolls until 2000, and thereafter Panama's self interest in keeping traffic up will restrain any impulse to raise tolls unrealistically.

17. The treaties are a bail-out of the New York bankers.

Not so. Panama is a flourishing regional banking center (71 banks with $9.7 billion in assets for customers public and private, in and out of Panama). At the start of 1977, Panama's government had a disbursed external debt of $1.1 billion of which $356 million was owed to U.S. banks. But Panama has never defaulted on a bank loan and there is, therefore, no reason for a "bail-out."

18. We have abandoned the Canal work force.

The treaty states that the Canal work force will enjoy, in general, the same terms and conditions in effect immediately prior to the treaty. In some cases, workers will have more rights than now. Employees adversely affected by the treaty will be eligible for priority job placement assistance and liberalized early retirement.

19. We risk having access to the Canal denied to us in wartime or other national emergency.

Not so. Panama knows that we have the right to take whatever action we deem necessary to maintain our access to the Canal. Furthermore, in emergency situations, we have the right to go to the head of the line. Panama would not want to challenge these rights, since the political and economic risks of doing so would be huge.

20. Latin American support for Panama's control of the Canal is more appearance than substance.

Not so. 26 Latin American countries signed the Declaration of Washington supporting the treaties. Leaders are watching our debate over the treaties very closely. The region's leading democracies who are the countries most directly concerned are Panama's strongest supporters for the treaties.

21. Carter has broken his campaign promise never to give up the Canal.

The President promised not to give up "effective control." Under the treaties we will operate the Canal in this century and will have the permanent right to keep it open in accordance with the terms of the neutrality treaty.

22. The Senate should not ratify a treaty opposed by the American people.

Many people who oppose the treaties simply do not understand them. Polls indicate this. Our job is to present a full explanation so that a reasoned and informed judgment can be made of whether the treaties are in our national interest.

23. We cannot protect the canal without retaining our full rights in the Zone.

Not so. Defense of the status quo would lead almost certainly to significant problems. On the other hand, relinquishing what we do not need reduces the likelihood of the need for force, gains Panama's cooperation in canal defense, provides us all the facilities we need until the year 2000, and, finally, gives us the right to defend the canal's neutrality permanently.

24. The new treaty with Panama will not last.

Panama has a good record of abiding by its treaty obligations, including those under the present treaty. I would rather take my chances with a treaty supported by two out of three Panamanians in 1977 than a treaty signed more than 70 years ago by a Frenchman which is now and has been universally opposed by Panamanians.

25. The treaty goes too far in trying to satisfy Panama.

Perpetuity and U.S. jurisdiction over the Canal Zone are the key objections by Panama and other nations to the existing relationship. No new treaty would be possible without elimination of these aspects of the existing relationship. In a tough negotiation, neither side gets all it might like, but these treaties contain every element needed to obtain our objective of permanent access to an efficiently operated and secure Canal.

Mr. CASE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moynihan). The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, our chairman, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Sparkman), has presented in a very fine and complete way the major considerations relating to this issue, and I shall not take the time of my colleagues to hear me beat the same straw.

We may have to deal with the problem in a somewhat repetitious fashion in connection with amendments, but there will be time enough to do that.

Obviously, we are beginning today a prolonged and perhaps even extended debate about these two canal treaties, although I was more than happy and not surprised to hear the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) state that he had no intention to filibuster. I have not heard of anybody who is. But if I am mistaken, we will have to deal with the matter as it comes up.

Certainly, it presents a controversy, I think one of the most intense foreign policy disputes we have had in this country since the Vietnam war. It does go to the heart of our image as a nation—our image both in our own eyes and in the eyes of the rest of the world.

Of course, it touches on our memories: The pride that we all had and have and always will have in the magnificent engineering achievement in finishing a task that the French could not complete, in the days when we worked our will, and in the popular memory of Americans everywhere when we were not being "pushed around by tinhorn dictators."

I did not live in those times. Well, I did, in a way. I was born in 1904, and the actions were still fresh in the minds of the people of this country. Certainly, they were fresh in the minds of my family. I do not think Teddy Roosevelt ever had a more devout admirer than my father, who was a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church to which President Roosevelt had allegiance.

I recall that, in many ways, my father followed the President's example and his precepts. We had six children in our family. That was one of the precepts that I think President Roosevelt suggested was good for good Americans to follow.

These treaties do touch on themes that stir our memories. I recall that my own response to the canal goes back to 1921, when, as an ordinary seaman, in my freshman year, on vacation from college, I went through the canal on a lumber boat from New York, the old Bush Terminal, up to Vancouver. I recall the great thrill that one feels, after a couple of weeks of sailing and seeing nothing, to see the canal, with the American flag flying over it. It is a very striking and touching thing. I do not in any way belittle feelings of that sort that people have. I think they are good feelings.

Little did I think, when I went through the canal that first time, or later as a tourist, that it was going to stir such a controversy in my lifetime. I just thought it was a fixed thing; it was ours. I understand that feeling.

Yet, nostalgia is not the most useful framework through which to view the treaties.

At the same time, we who support the treaties as well as those who oppose them should take into account the psychological aspects of this dispute. It would be a mistake for those of us who support the treaties to dismiss the opposition—I do not think any of us really do—as emotionalism or some sort of outdated chauvinism.

My office, as I am sure every other office in the Senate, has had thousands of letters and postcards and telegrams, communications of all sorts, from those who oppose the treaties. Some of that is organized, admittedly. Some of it may be ill-informed. In fact, the barrage started even before the treaties were signed and published. But the concern cannot be dismissed on any grounds such as that. There are real and deep concerns beneath the opposition, and they should be addressed.

The Foreign Relations Committee, as our chairman has told the Senate, held extensive hearings here, and a number of us made trips to Panama. We have been criticized as doing this a little too often. I do not think that criticism is very well justified. I would much prefer not having taken the 2 or 3 days we did take to go down there. It would have been much more pleasurable to stay home. The companionship of my colleagues is most enjoyable, but I had many other things to do. However, those trips were useful and they sharpened many points in my mind that helped me arrive at a conclusion.

There is the question of concern not related to specific provisions of the treaty—rather, the general idea of giving up this piece of America, as many people have come to feel about it—I am not talking technically about sovereignty now. I am just talking about our returning the zone to Panama and turning the canal over to Panama. I think that many people subconsciously feel it is another evidence that America is withdrawing from the world and that this is a very important factor in the trauma that the canal controversy has dealt us.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. CASE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho. (Mr. Church).

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I think that the able Senator from New Jersey has touched upon the keystone of much of the passionate reaction that typifies much of the mail in opposition to the treaties, when he says that a new arrangement over the future operation and control of the canal, as contemplated under these treaties with Panama, is viewed as a kind of retreat or withdrawal on the part of the United States.

I could not agree with him more because my mail reflects this same feeling, and I am sure that this has been the common experience of all Members of the Senate. Yet I find it curious. I remember at the end of the Second World War it was the United States that first proposed to grant independence to the people of the Philippines. No one at that time suggested that this was a serious withdrawal or retreat on the part of the United States from the Western Pacific, even though the resources of the Philippines were massive by comparison to those of Panama. It was not viewed as an act of weakness or retreat, but rather as the act of a self-confident nation which still believed in its own traditions.

We granted the people of the Philippines their independence because we recognized that they had the right to govern themselves, even as we had claimed that right against George III 200 years ago in the American Revolution.

Then I recall some years later when the United States decided by treaty to return jurisdiction of Okinawa to the Japanese. There was no hue and cry about withdrawal or defeat when that treaty was brought before us for ratification, even though we had fought and bled for Okinawa in the Second World War and the sacrifice had been great, even though American control over Okinawa could not have been successfully contested by any exertion of power directed against us, for we dominated the whole of the Pacific.

Strangely, no one complained at that time that this was an act of weakness on the part of the United States. Rather it was just the opposite. Everyone seemed to recognize then that it took a strong, just, self-confident country to recognize that the people of Okinawa, being, of Japanese origin, wishing to live again as a part of their own homeland, were entitled to that new arrangement.

MR. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. Case).

MR. CASE. I yield to my eloquent friend for as long as he wants to talk at any time. But I did want to point this out: That there was this difference, and that is at Okinawa we just finished a victorious war.

MR. CHURCH. Yes.

MR. CASE. We did not need to be reassuring ourselves about our strength, our will, our determination, or our position as a world leader. We had established that. And it is always a little easier to be generous when you are self-confident.

The history since and including Vietnam has been quite different, at least so it seems to many people, and that is why I think they regard this as another step in withdrawal from a position of world power and a shrinking of America which they are deeply concerned about. That is the main difference.

MR. CHURCH. Yes; I fully concur with the Senator because this action comes after the termination of the misbegotten policy in Southeast Asia, and the general psychology in the country is different now than it was then. Nevertheless, I think it is important to remind ourselves that recognizing the aspirations of the Panamanian people in these treaties is similar to what we did in the case of the Philippines and in the case of Okinawa. Back in those days the people of the United States upheld the decisions that we made in granting independence to the Philippines and in restoring Okinawa to the Japanese as assertions of a self-confident nation and as acts which were consistent with our traditional principles.

Now, my question to the able Senator from New Mexico, the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee, is this.

Mr. CASE. New Jersey.

Mr. CHURCH. New Jersey; I am sorry.

Mr. CASE. I have that trouble with Senator Domenici, too.

Mr. CHURCH. The distinguished Senator is quite capable of representing two States, or three.

Mr. CASE. I thank the Senator. I hope that the citizens of my State and the voters will agree with his assessment come November.

Mr. CHURCH. The question that I would put to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey and the ranking Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee is this: Are we not undertaking, in essence, to do the same for Panama as we previously did for the people of Okinawa and the people of the Philippines by putting an end to a canal zone which is 10 miles wide and 40 miles long that crosses the waist of Panama, the middle of that little country, in which we exercise, in effect, the rights of sovereignty, where American law and American jurisdiction is total? Do you not agree that the aspirations of the Panamanians, with respect to the restoration of the land as a part of their own country does not differ in character from the aspirations of the people of the Philippines and of the people of Okinawa when they asked for their independence in the one case and their restoration to their own homeland in the other, be acknowledged and conferred by the United States?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. Case).

Mr. CASE. The Senator from New Jersey responds: I do. I do most heartily agree with the Senator from Idaho.

This is as far as we are concerned in the same vein. Our action is in the same line of thought and principle as our action taken there, and it is the right thing to do. It is the right thing to do because of the Panamanians, and it is the right thing to do because of the United States. We are not giving up anything that we have a secure hold on. We may be giving up some things that are illusions of security. But we are not losing our security. In fact, we are increasing it. So, on both grounds of idealism and of pragmatism, this is the right thing to do for the United States at this time. And one does not have to go into the history of our involvement from the beginning with a consideration of a canal at that general area has gone on for more than a century and a half I think. All of the actions that we have taken perhaps are actions that we might not be very proud of having spread out in the public view again, although most everybody knows about what happened in those days.

But we do not have to upbraid ourselves for what went on in the past to justify our getting out now.

It is in our present interest to do this. We will, by this action, in my view, have a much more secure hold on the right of transit through the canal for our vessels in time of war and in time of peace than if we attempted to hold on under anything like the present arrangements.

This is the way the Senate should be looking at the matter. I take it we are here to express the best in America. But I do not think we are necessarily here to give away America, and the Senator would agree to that, I am sure. Nor do we regard this as any such thing. We are here to preserve the right of transit for Americans and the rest of the world, both in peace and for us in war, with the right of going to the head of the line, which the Senator and I have insisted on from the beginning.

On our first day of hearings, when Secretary Vance was testifying before us, he made the point, under our questioning, that these treaties provide for that. The issue aroused, of course, some concern and some statements made in Panama required clarification. Our committee made the claim that we would have to have that clarification, and it came about, through the joint statement of the President and General Torrijos, which we recommend and which undoubtedly will be incorporated into the treaty as two parts amendments under the leadership of our majority and minority leaders.

This is an affirmative action—and affirmative action in the interests of this country and in the interests of all that is good in our relations with the rest of the world, including Panama and Latin America especially.

I do not berate the concerns that people have had about this as a possible expression or symbol of withdrawal, but that is not the way to look at it. It is not a withdrawal from anything that we have. It is not submitting to blackmail. A person takes precautions against catching a cold by dressing himself warmly in the winter-time. That is not submitting to blackmail from winter "coming down from the frozen north, driving his iron chariot forth."

This is just commonsense. It is just commonsense.

MR. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

MR. CASE. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moynihan). The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

MR. CHURCH. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague, Senator Case, places these treaties in the right context. He emphasizes that we should look to the future, not the past. He emphasizes that the American interest is in the maintenance of a canal in Panama as a neutral, safe, and open passageway for our use and the use of other nations in the years ahead.

We have recommended, as a committee, that the Senate adopt an amendment that will eliminate any question as to the interpretation to be placed upon the provisions of the neutrality treaty with respect to the right of American ships to transit the canal at the head of the line in any case of future emergency or national need. That is one vital interest of the United States which will be clearly preserved if the Senate adopts the amendment we have recommended.

The second amendment to which the Senator has referred relates to the unilateral right of the United States, if necessary, even after the end of the century, to intervene for the purpose of protecting the canal against any threat that might affect its neutrality; and again the committee has asked the Senate to write that provision explicitly into the treaties.

If the Senate acts as I anticipate it will, and adopts both of these recommended amendments, I can support the amended treaties with full confidence that they will serve the best interests of the United States in the years ahead. If the treaties are not so amended, there is a possibility of ambiguity in the future that would concern me sufficiently that I would have to cast my votes against the ratification of these two treaties.

But when the Senator from New Jersey looked back to the early days and said that what we did then is a part of the past, and we must now address ourselves to the interests of our country in the future, he underscored for me a point that I think needs to be emphasized in this debate.

Back in 1903, this was a very different world. Half a dozen major powers controlled the whole world. There was a single empire, the British Empire, upon which the Sun never set, exercising its jurisdiction over one-third of the land area of the globe. Half a dozen imperial powers maintained colonies in Africa, in South America, and in Asia, and dominated the whole world.

In the 75 years that have followed, we have seen the most extraordinary transformation. The empires have melted away like so many icebergs in the spring. A hundred new independent governments have been established where colonies once existed. The Suez Canal, once controlled by foreign interests, has been restored to Egypt.

There is no way to preserve the past, no matter how nostalgically we might cling to it. The interests of the United States will be protected through a new arrangement with Panama which reflects the realities of the present. And even as our own national pride naturally is identified with the heroic achievements of the earlier years, when we managed to construct a canal that at the time was the greatest single engineering undertaking in history, even though we may still think of the Panama Canal in terms of our conquest of malaria and yellow fever, and Teddy Roosevelt and the White Fleet and the Big Stick, those are days that related to a period of empire, when great nations did as they pleased, with little hindrance. Those memories have nothing whatever to do with the realities of 1978.

Therefore, I now suggest, Mr. President, that retaining American jurisdiction over a canal zone in a little country where we assert all the prerogatives of a colonial power is an anachronism which the world no longer accepts, and which the Panamanians cannot accept. For us to persist in this claim upon a little country would be to invite recrimination, hostility, and resentment that will extend far beyond Panama, and will affect our relations with all of the other republics of South America throughout the Hemisphere.

Mr. CASE. The Senator is so right. I am so grateful to him for his intervention. He may intervene any time.

Mr. CHURCH. I really apologize for having taken so much of the Senator's time.

Mr. CASE. I did not mind. I said to intervene and that is what I meant. It is a great compliment to the Senator from New Jersey to have the intervention of his colleague from Idaho. This will go down in history as one of the best speeches I ever made because of the intervention of my colleague, the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. President, I should like to point out that it is not just us soft-headed liberals that think this way. A fairly tough guy, General Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, expressed himself very simply and eloquently on the matter in our hearings. He said:

I think to describe the United States with this action as proof that the United States is a paper tiger is absolutely wrong. I think, rather than that, it shows the United States to be enlightened. I think it shows the United States to be determined to live in the world today and not in the world of yesterday. I think it shows that we profit by the experience of the Portuguese in Angola and Mozambique, the French in Algeria and Indochina, and ourselves in the Philippines.

As my friend from Idaho pointed out, in Okinawa, too.
Returning to the general, he said:

We left the Philippines for the same reasons that I think we should renegotiate these. It is in recognition of the importance of the Panama Canal that I feel we should do this because we would then be guaranteed, I think, of a better opportunity and guarantee in the future of the use of the canal.

And former Secretary Kissinger, who was before us at the same time, and who is a fairly tough guy, said:

I recognize the deep feeling of many Americans who wish, after the Vietnam tragedy, to see an end to yielding and retreat by the United States. No one can appreciate such concerns better than one who strove for an honorable outcome during the Vietnam period.

He spoke with particular poignancy on that point:

But the Canal is not the issue to select to demonstrate that we remain strong and resolute. Panama is the smallest and weakest of nations. We are not "giving" the Canal to Panama; we are, rather, ensuring our ability to protect it. By taking constructive action now to revise our relationship with Panama in an atmosphere free of physical pressure, while we are still able objectively to assess the long term risks and benefits, we will be demonstrating fundamental strength, not weakness. It is just this ability to distinguish between symbol and reality, to plan for future needs and to take timely action to advance our basic interests, that is the essence of a strong and effective world policy.

Mr. President, those are very, very true words and very wise words. I should like, I think, to conclude this initial statement of my views with them.

I ask unanimous consent, also, that certain additional remarks be printed as part of my statement for purposes of the Record.

There being no objection, the additional statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE

There are two major points which are being resolved with the leaderships amendments.

They are: one, the right of the U.S. to send troops to defend the Canal after the year 2000 when U.S. forces are to be finally withdrawn, and two, the right of the U.S. Navy to expeditious passage through the Canal in an emergency by going to the head of the line. As a result of the questioning during the hearings and agreements obtained when Senate foreign relations Committee members met Panamanian leaders, the Committee recommended that the treaties be amended to clarify and guarantee these rights. The language was taken from the joint Statement of Understanding agreed to by the United States and Panama on October 14, 1977. That statement was widely disseminated in Panama before the October 23 plebescite in which Panamanian voters approved the treaties. Thus a new plebescite is not necessary.

There is a third key article in the treaties as originally submitted to the Senate last September. In effect, Article V of the neutrality treaty prohibits Panama from allowing Cuban or Soviet troops on its territory after the year 2000 when the existing American presence is phased out.

These new provisions, absent in the 1903 treaty, strengthen the long range protection of our overall national security interests.

This was a focal point during the hearings and the trip to Panama was helpful in getting a first-hand appraisal.

The Panama Canal Zone—a ten mile wide strip—is an American enclave which cuts Panama in two—a fact that many Panamanians resent. As discussed in briefings there with Lt. Gen. D. D. McAuliffe commander of the U.S. Southern Command, the thick jungle and hilly terrain along the Canal could make it easy for guerrillas to fire at ships, thus interrupting or halting effective use of the Canal without even trying to damage its vulnerable locks and support facilities. There is a concern that the U.S. would have to deal with terrorism and jungle war—which the Pentagon estimates could tie up 100,000 men for years—if the nationalism and anti-Americanism in Panama and other Latin American countries burst into leftist extremism in a reaction against rejection of new treaties.

Considering these possibilities is not giving into blackmail but a prudent effort to take into account all the factors involved in judging the future of the treaties.

Evaluating the treaties has some similarities to buying a house. Few are perfect and have all the features one would like. It took 13 years to hammer out the treaties. We did not get everything we wanted, nor did the Panamanians. But a new structure was created with a stronger footing. After weeks of hearings and investigations into it, I have concluded that, on balance, the treaties protect our national interests and should be ratified with the two amendments recommended by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin).

MR. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, as the only and lonely member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who voted against approval of the treaties, I wish at the outset to thank the distinguished chairman of the committee (Mr. Sparkman) and the ranking minority member (Mr. Case) for their courtesy and their consideration during the course of the committee's deliberations. I wish to say now, as I have said before, that I respect our two Senate leaders and those of our colleagues who have reached a conclusion contrary to mine—those who are convinced in their own minds that these treaties do represent and serve the best interests of our Nation. I salute them for having the courage of their convictions, because I believe, with Edmund Burke, that a Senator does owe his constituents his judgment and should not sacrifice it to public opinion alone.

However, Mr. President, I also believe that when the call on the merits of an issue is as close as this is, or as close as I perceive it to be, the judgment of the people ought not to be taken lightly. Very honestly and frankly, I have come to the conclusion that, in this situation, as so often is the case, the people are right.

Mr. President, as nearly as I can boil down the basic arguments of many people around the country who believe these treaties should be approved, there are three:

First, they believe, and are told that the Panama Canal is obsolete or becoming obsolete—that we really do not need it anymore or will not need it very long.

That is not the case. Far from it, The canal is vital to U.S. security, important to our economy—and will be more, not less, important in the years ahead—as I will detail at a later point in my statement.

Second. A second argument is that unless these treaties are ratified unknown terrorists and radicals will blow up the canal.

Like many other Americans, I am shocked and repulsed by such an argument, or suggestion, particularly when it is put forth by officials in high places in our Government. Surely, if we want self-respect as well as the respect of others, we cannot make our foreign policy on such a basis. Furthermore, as I will explain, I am deeply concerned that approval of these treaties will render the canal more vulnerable, not less, to the dangers of terrorism and sabotage in the years ahead.

Finally, the argument is made that we should ratify these treaties to divest ourselves of the guilt and stigma we are supposed to feel concerning the U.S. role in connection with the 1903 treaty and our operation of the Panama Canal.

Frankly, along with most Americans, I am proud of the United States role in building, operating, and maintaining the engineering masterpiece that is the Panama Canal. I do not think there is reason to be ashamed or to apologize. The canal has been good for the United States—and good for Panama—and good for the world.

On the other hand, for other positive reasons—and because times and circumstances do change—I am willing to recognize, as one Senator, that a major revision in our treaty relationship with the Republic of Panama is in order—that it could serve the interests of both countries.

My problem, as a lawyer and as a Senator, is that after carefully studying the text of these treaties, and the accompanying documents, I could come to no conclusion other than that they are fatally flawed—that they are riddled with ambiguities—that the security interests of the United States are not adequately protected—and that the defects are so serious and basic that they cannot be remedied by trying to rewrite the treaties here on the Senate floor.

Being the lone dissenter on the Foreign Relations Committee—and for that reason alone—I find myself thrust into the role of floor manager for the opposition. I wish to make it clear, however, that my views—and what I say—will not necessarily reflect the views of other Senators who oppose these treaties. Each of them will, of course, speak for himself as this debate proceeds.

Although I believe these treaties should not be ratified, there is a course open to the Senate other than outright rejection, and strongly urge the Senate to consider it.

Let me explain by first underscoring the fact that I recognize the importance of maintaining close and friendly relations with the people of Panama and with the people of other nations in our hemisphere. I am conscious of, and concerned about, the impact that outright rejection by the Senate could have upon those relations.

Under the Constitution, the Senate's role is one of "advice and consent." Instead of consenting to these treaties, I believe it would be a wiser course for the Senate to exercise only its "advice" authority. In other words, without rejecting the treaties outright, the Senate, after examining these treaties in detail, ought to advise the President to send the negotiators back to the drawing boards with instructions to persist until more acceptable treaties can be fashioned.

Despite all of his knowledge about the history of the canal, or perhaps because of it, David McCullough, the distinguished author of "The Path Between the Seas" acknowledged before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that he had experienced great difficulty in reaching a personal decision about the merit of these treaties. Although he finally decided, on balance, to support the treaties, when he appeared before the committee he made this profound and perceptive point:

* * * If we say "yes" to these [treaties] in a grudging way * * * [because we think] we have painted ourselves into a corner and we have to get out * * * [that would be] unfortunate * * * [and] just as wrong, and in some ways a greater mistake than to say "no" in the spirit of saying "no" because [it should be] done right—because we don't want to have to come back in 15 or 20 years and have to do it all over again.

So, it would be my hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will consider and act in that spirit with respect to the treaties now before us.

In other words, I concur with those of my colleagues who believe and who will argue in the weeks to come that rejection of these treaties would be unfortunate and would adversely affect our relations with our allies in the hemisphere. But I also believe that it would be wrong to reject these treaties in effect by adopting substantive amendments on the Senate floor—that could do even more to poison the air of friendship than outright rejection.

Let's not kid ourselves or any one else. To make substantive changes in these treaties by amendment on the Senate floor really amounts to rejection. It would amount to an ultimatum to the Panamanian people on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

Of real concern also is the possibility that the self-appointed temporary ruler now controlling Panama might say with respect to other substantive amendments, as he has already said with respect to the Byrd-Baker amendment that it will not have to be submitted to a plebescite of the Panamanian people.

In other words, we could end up with an agreement with a self-appointed temporary ruler of Panama, but without an agreement or treaty with the people of Panama. In my view it is vital to our future relationship that any new treaty be an agreement with the people of Panama.

Mr. President, I wish to review with the Senate some of the basic concerns I have with respect to these treaties. I will discuss the broad issue of the canal and U.S. security; the question of a new or second canal, as well as some other concern.

Military expert may disagree as to the advisability of ratifying these treaties, but it is clear there is general agreement that the Panama Canal is very important—if not vital—to the security of the United States.

Indeed, as the Soviet Navy continues to grow larger and larger, while our own Navy shrinks in size—the canal becomes more—not less—important.

In just the last 10 years—since 1968—the number of ships in the U.S. Navy has been cut by more than half, from 976 vessels to 459. In 1974, when the Soviet fleet was smaller than it is today, our Joint Chiefs of staff stated that we need more than 800 ships to "support our current national defense strategy."

Yet our shipbuilding funds continue to be reduced—navy officials acknowledge that the fleet will shrink further in size before there is an upturn in the numbers—and the goal of expanding to more than 500 ships by the early 1980's now seems elusive.

In contrast, the Soviet Navy by 1975 had grown to 1,200 vessels—although, admittedly, their ships do not compare with ours in tonnage or combat effectiveness.

But the sobering fact is that the rapidly expanding Soviet Navy raises real concerns about future control of the maritime “choke points” of the world—one of which is the Panama Canal.

As Adm. Thomas Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has testified, we do not have a two ocean Navy. He said:

A large majority of our war and contingency plans are totally infeasible unless one assumes that full and priority use of the canal will be available.

It is true that our aircraft carriers, of which we have 13, are too large to transit the canal. But the United States has a Navy that is effective in both major oceans precisely because the rest of the Navy, particularly supply and support ships for the aircraft carriers, are able to shuttle between the oceans through the canal.

If access to the canal were denied to ships of the American navy, the trip from ocean to ocean would involve an 8,000 mile journey around Cape Horn—an extra 17 days for a warship travelling at 20 knots.

In a letter to President Carter on June 8 of last year, four of the Nation's most respected naval leaders—each of them a former Chief of Naval Operations—forcefully stated that the strategic and economic values of the canal are at least as important to the United States now as ever before, and they declared that—

Loss of the Panama Canal, which would be a serious set-back in war, would contribute to the encirclement of the U.S. by hostile naval forces, and threaten our ability to survive.

These officers—retired Admirals Carney, Anderson, Burke, and Moorer—forcefully warned the President of possible dangers to the canal because of the close ties between Panama and Cuba “which in turn is closely tied with the Soviet Union.”

Of course we can only speculate about the real intentions of the Soviet Union and its Caribbean proxy, Cuba, with respect to the canal. But few will argue against the proposition that it would be a tragic blow to United States and free world security if the Panama Canal should fall into Communist hands.

Since as far back as the 1959 Panama riots, there has been reason for concern about the covetous eye of Mr. Castro. Those concerns have been underscored in recent years by the avowed friendship between Mr. Castro and General Torrijos. If evidence of Cuban influence in Panama has not been so obvious recently, it may be because at the moment Castro has his hands very full in Africa.

Against this background relating to the canal's strategic and political significance, let me comment on the adequacy of the proposed treaties in protecting the security and other interests of the United States.

During the 1976 Presidential campaign, Candidate Jimmy Carter told the voters:

I would never give up complete control or practical control of the Panama Canal Zone. (Emphasis supplied.)

But these treaties—negotiated since President Carter assumed office—not only turn the canal over to Panama in the year 2000; they would also turn over practical—if not complete—control of the Canal Zone within 36 months after ratification.

Even if we accept the decision to turn the canal over to Panama in the year 2000, our security interests still require, in my view, that the treaties be negotiated to include certain fundamental safeguards:

First, we need more control and jurisdiction between now and the year 2000 to insure that we will be able effectively to operate and defend the canal.

Second, we must have the right, in unambiguous terms, beyond the year 2000 to use military force, if necessary, to protect the neutrality of the canal against any threat—even a domestic Panamanian threat, or particularly an internal threat from within Panama, because that poses the greatest danger.

Third, we need to maintain our option to negotiate for construction of a second (perhaps sea-level) canal outside of Panama, should that prove necessary because of Panamanian intransigence, or desirable because of economic or security considerations.

As drawn, the Canal Treaty and the Neutrality Treaty do not provide these important safeguards.

Even if it is conceded that the United States is not now sovereign in the Panama Canal Zone, there is no question that under the treaty of 1903, The United States has all the rights, power, and authority as if it were sovereign. I strongly suggest that control on that order is important if the United States is to be able effectively to operate and maintain the Panama Canal between now and the year 2000. In other words, if we are going to keep the canal for 23 years, it is essential during that period at least for the United States to retain adequate control and jurisdiction.

Under the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, the United States would have the responsibility to operate the canal during the next 23 years with employees—both United States and Panamanian—who would be subject, even while performing their duties with respect to the canal, to the laws of Panama, the police of Panama, and the courts of Panama.

In other words, shortly after the ratification, we would be in the position of trying to operate and maintain the canal in a foreign country—rather than in a canal zone under our jurisdiction.

I am deeply concerned that instead of solving problems, this arrangement is pregnant with the seeds of acrimony and conflict.

Under the treaty, persons employed by the Panama Canal Commission would be “employees of the United States”; they would have the right to be represented by unions and to “negotiate collective contracts.” If disputes arose—and that would not be unusual in labor management relations—how would they be resolved?

Under the treaty arrangement, the Commission itself would be immune from suit in the courts of Panama, and could be sued only in the U.S. Court in Louisiana—something of an inconvenience for employees in Panama who may claim back pay for discrimination or who may have any other claims against the Commission. How would the Commission enforce legal obligations undertaken by others—a union, for example? Apparently, such matters would be left to the Panamanian courts. Would they apply U.S. law or Panamanian law?

It is no wonder that many U.S. military and civilian personnel who now work in the Canal Zone are deeply concerned about these aspects of the treaty arrangement.

Outside the boundaries of our four remaining military bases, of course, U.S. military and civilian personnel would be subject at all times to arrest and prosecution by Panamanian police in Panamanian courts.

We are assured by the State Department that arrested U.S. personnel in Panama would be protected by a "status of forces" type agreement set forth in annex D, which is similar to agreements we have with Japan and certain NATO countries where U.S. forces are stationed.

Annex D does recite that such U.S. citizens charged with crime in a Panamanian court would have the right to a "prompt and speedy trial," protection against involuntary confessions, self-incrimination, and the like. But the decision on what constitutes a "speedy trial" or an "involuntary confession" will be left, once again, to the Panamanian courts.

For years, Soviet citizens have been "guaranteed" human rights by the Constitution of the Soviet Union. The only problem, of course, is that officials of the Soviet Union pay no attention to those guarantees.

That reference would be unfair and out of order. I concede, if the Panamanian Government under General Torrijos had a good record of observing and respecting human rights in Panama. However, despite the fact that similar "guarantees" are set forth in the Constitution of Panama, last year the Torrijos government had the worst human rights record of any country in this hemisphere, except Cuba. Indeed, in this respect, Panama was rated by Freedom House as being about on a par with the Soviet Union.

Or status of forces agreements in other situations have worked reasonably well, perhaps because the host country has wanted the continued presence of our U.S. troops in their borders. Obviously, if a NATO ally did not appreciate our military presence and asked us to leave, we would.

In contrast, our troops are—and would be—stationed in the Canal Zone because we have a treaty right to protect the canal. Under the new treaty—at least in theory—our right to have troops there until the year 2000 would not depend on the continuing permission of General Torrijos or any successor.

In that kind of setting, it seems to me there is reason for concern about the adequacy of the protection that is accorded to U.S. citizens in annex D.

In a country where anti-Americanism has a proven political value, and where courts may be heavily influenced by the ruler in power, one is left to wonder whether such a treaty arrangement could even be used as the basis for harassing U.S. military and civilian personnel to force them out of the country.

Because many U.S. citizens—as well as some black Panamanians—who now work in the Canal Zone are deeply concerned about their human rights if the new treaty should be ratified, morale among such employees by all accounts, is "very poor." Many of these employees indicate that they will leave if these treaties are approved; one recent poll indicated that more than 60 percent of U.S. civilians in the zone consider themselves in that category.

According to Gen. H. R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, there are at least 1,000 highly skilled U.S. citizens whose services are absolutely essential and for whom Panamanian replacements could not be trained in the short term. In this category are 210 ship pilots, all but 2 of whom are U.S. citizens.

In view of the great importance of keeping the canal open, it would be ironic indeed, it would be tragic if the Senate, by approving these treaties, should trigger an exodus that closes down the canal.

I am concerned not only with the mishmash of jurisdiction and responsibility that would exist between now and the year 2000 under the proposed treaties, but also about the situation that would prevail under the so-called Neutrality Treaty after the year 2000—particularly in light of differences in interpretation which have existed, and in some vital respects continue to exist, between the officials of our two countries.

For example, with respect to the right of the United States under article IV of the Neutrality Treaty to intervene and defend the neutrality of the canal with military force, if necessary, against an internal threat from within Panama, major disagreements have existed between United States and Panamanian negotiators. Those disagreements have continued after the signing of the treaties and they continue even after the joint statement of October 14, 1977, issued by President Carter and General Torrijos.

We owe it to ourselves, Mr. President, and to our children—who would have to suffer the consequences of our mistakes—to understand the depth of these disagreements and their grave implications for the future, if left unresolved.

The chief Panamanian negotiator, Dr. Romulo Escobar, declared publicly that:

The draft neutrality pact * * * does not make the U.S. a guarantor of (the canal's) neutrality * * *."

Panamanian spokesmen have insisted that the United States would be able to respond militarily only if a foreign power attacked or threatened the canal. Just as often, our own negotiators and others have publicly asserted that the United States has a right to protect the neutrality of the canal against any threat, including a Panamanian threat.

Such statements and counterstatements are chronicled and detailed in the statement of minority views which I have filed as part of the committee's report and which are available to all Senators.

I recognize and respect the effort that has been made to end some of the ambiguity, in particular the joint statement of October 14, 1977, issued by President Carter and General Torrijos. Without doubt it is an improvement over the actual text of the neutrality treaty, but unfortunately the joint statement itself is not without ambiguities.

(Mr. RIEGLE assumed the chair.)

Mr. GRIFFIN. Later on that same day of October 14, for example, General Torrijos stated that the United States would have the right to defend the canal if it were attacked by "a great power." Shortly thereafter, Ambassador Linowitz replied that the United States had a right to defend the canal against any threat or aggression from whatever quarter. So the difference in interpretation quickly surfaced again even after the Carter-Torrijos statement.

The situation was further complicated when General Torrijos arrived back in Panama and said, "I haven't even signed an autograph"—at least implicitly suggesting that the unsigned statement was of questionable legal validity.

When the Byrd-Baker amendments are adopted, as I predict they will be, the Carter-Torrijos joint statement will actually be incorporated as part of the text of the Neutrality Treaty that will be an improvement but, unfortunately, this action will not erase differences of interpretation which persist, as underscored by the American Law Division of the Library of Congress in a report which concluded:

* * * It is not altogether clear that the joint statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

Following the Carter-Torrijos joint statement and shortly before the vote by the Panamanian people, General Torrijos complicated an uncertain situation still further when he told the Panamanian people on radio and television that the role of the United States under the Neutrality Treaty was to defend the canal from foreign aggression if requested by Panama. Not once but twice he said:

* * * the United States is obligated to come to our defense * * * when we ring the bell here, when we push the button * * * (Emphasis supplied.)

On the record, it is painfully obvious that the United States and Panama have been in disagreement—and still disagree, despite the October 14 Carter-Torrijos joint statement—on at least two major points:

Our administration tells the American people that the United States will have the right to defend the canal after the year 2000 against any threat to its neutrality, including an internal threat from within Panama. But spokesmen for Panama assert that the United States will have such a right only if the canal is threatened by a foreign power.

Our administration tells the American people that the United States can determine unilaterally when such a right to defend the canal can be exercised. But Panamanian spokesmen insist that U.S. forces can come in only when requested or when the action is agreed to by Panama.

We would be living in a fool's paradise to assume that these contradictory interpretations will simply go away if this treaty arrangement is ratified.

It is essential, Mr. President, that we avoid being placed in the dilemma which such differing interpretations would create. Because it is by failing to reach a real agreement with the people of Panama by trying to paper over serious deficiencies and disagreements for short-term political gain, that we could be buying ourselves a one-way ticket to another Vietnam.

Mr. President, particularly, if we are to consider turning the canal over to Panama in the year 2000, and if the security and economic interests of the United States are to be protected, then we should not relinquish our option to negotiate for construction of a second canal, possibly a sea-level canal, in a country other than Panama.

That is exactly what we would do under article XII of the proposed canal treaty, which reads in part:

During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

In exchange for such a clear and unequivocal commitment on our part not to build a new canal in any other country, surely it is reasonable to ask what would we get in return under the treaty?

The administration says we get a commitment in the treaty that Panama will not collaborate with any other nation to build a second canal in Panama. Whether that would be a fair exchange is open to serious questions. But beyond that, there are three important points to be made: First, the language of the proposed treaty does not say that; second, we already have such a guarantee under the existing 1903 treaty; and third, the existing guarantee would be wiped out if we were to ratify the proposed treaty before us.

In exchange for our clear and unambiguous commitment not to build a new canal in any other country, Panama would be bound, and I put "bound" in quotes, by the following language in article XII:

* * * [D]uring the duration of the Treaty, both parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms agreeable to both parties, for its construction.

It is not necessary to have taken a high school course in business law to understand that, under such language, Panama would be obligated only to "study" and to "negotiate." There is no clear and unambiguous commitment there—or anywhere else in the treaty—that would preclude Panama's joining with a nation other than the United States to construct a second, or sea level, canal in Panama provided they complied with the requirements of the treaty that they first study and negotiate.

Mr. President, even though the existing canal is not obsolete, and will not be obsolete in the near future, it is necessary and important that we do look toward the day when the existing Panama Canal will no longer be adequate. The dream of a sea-level canal, a canal without locks, ought to be more than just a dream in an era when men and women are going to the moon.

It is true that studies have been made and have indicated that the least expensive place to build a second or sea-level canal would be in Panama. But I suggest that for political and other reasons, it might be very wise to construct such a second canal in another country, even though it would cost a few billion dollars more.

Furthermore, perhaps such a second canal should be built in another country under the auspices of the Organization of American States or some other arrangement of international interests.

In a study published under the auspices of the Council on Foreign Relations in 1967, Immanuel J. Klette observed:

Although the cost of construction bears on the final choices, it should not be the prime factor in making decisions on a new canal. A waterway which is less expensive in dollars may be the most expensive in political consequences.

As we move toward a new treaty relationship with Panama, we should not ignore the value of competition—economic, political, and even diplomatic competition.

Holding open even the possibility of building a new canal outside of Panama—an option foreclosed by the proposed treaty—could provide very important and useful leverage in our relations with Panama.

After all, for the foreseeable future, Panama's economic survival is dependent on the Panama Canal. As Prof. Edwin C. Hoyt observed several years ago in the Virginia Journal of International Law:

If Panama is too intransigent, she may lose the [sea level] canal to one of these other countries. This would be an economic disaster for Panama.

Furthermore, if a second canal were constructed elsewhere in Latin America, Panama would be forced to keep its own tolls competitive or risk losing most of the traffic to its almost certainly more modern rival.

A major conference on Panama sponsored by Georgetown University's Center for Strategic Studies in 1967 reached this key conclusion:

Though the Republic of Panama seems technically to be the best place for a future canal facility, the United States should not abandon the right to approach other countries for possible canal location in the event that future political conditions exclude the project from Panama.

Under the circumstances, it is very difficult for me to see how article XII of the proposed canal treaty serves the interests of the United States.

In my minority views, Mr. President, I also speak to certain economic concerns that trouble me and many of my colleagues, and indeed many Americans. I will only state here in these remarks that the soothing assurances by President Carter and others speaking for the administration that these treaties, if ratified, will not create a financial burden on the people of the United States are hardly justified by the record, particularly the record of the hearings of the Committee on Armed Services conducted only last week.

Finally, Mr. President, I feel compelled to call attention to a matter outside the text of the treaty which prompts a question: Despite the 13 or 14 years of intermittent negotiations, were these treaties, insofar as some of the final details are concerned, negotiated in haste, under the pressure of a time deadline?

Because the treaties contain so much ambiguous language and so many provisions of doubtful merit, it is appropriate to ask such a question. And, unfortunately, there is reason for some concern.

On February 10, 1977, shortly after he took office, President Carter named Mr. Sol Linowitz to represent the United States as a negotiator for the Panama Canal treaties. But, Mr. Linowitz was appointed only on a temporary basis—for a 6-month period. Under the law, an appointment on this basis does not require confirmation by the Senate. Such an appointment bypasses the usual scrutiny by a Senate committee of a nominee's qualifications and possible conflict of interest. Doubtless the administration had its reasons for pursuing this course of action.

But because the Senate is an integral part of the treaty-making process under the Constitution, I would suggest that it was unwise—and something of an affront to the Senate—for the administration not to submit a treaty negotiator's name for confirmation. Utilizing such a short circuit procedure did not build Senate confidence in the treaty negotiations.

Even more important, in my judgment, is the question of whether this arbitrary and unnecessary 6-month limit on the tenure of a chief negotiator may have led the United States to make hasty and unwise concessions under the pressure of an artificial deadline.

We have been given to understand that at least one very significant concession—the surrender of our option to build a second canal outside of Panama—was made at the last minute.

We are left to wonder what else we may have given away—what ambiguities we may have settled for—what loose ends we may have left untied—in our rush to beat the clock.

We do know that:

Mr. Linowitz was appointed on February 10, 1977—and he had just 6 months, and 6 months only, to bring in a new treaty.

And interestingly enough, it was on August 10, 1977—exactly 6 months later, to the day—that negotiators for the two countries finally announced their agreement in principle on new treaties relating to the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, for these reasons and others which I shall not take the time to discuss here today, it is my reluctant but inescapable conclusion that these should not be approved by the Senate.

Any new treaty relationship built upon the ambiguities of the treaties now before us would be doomed to failure from the start. We cannot afford to approve them as they stand. To do so would be no favor either to the Panamanians or to the people of the United States.

It is argued by some that defects in the treaties can be remedied if the Senate will adopt a series of amendments. I cannot agree. Such an expedient, however attractive it may seem politically, would be inadequate and unwise. It would do both too little and too much.

If we must say “no” to these treaties—as I am now convinced we must—I believe, along with David McCulloch, that how we say “no” in this situation is very important in terms of our future relations with the people of Panama and the people of the Hemisphere.

I do not favor adoption on the Senate floor of a series of substantive amendments on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. That would be an affront to the Panamanian people. Furthermore, we would run the real risk that the Panamanian ruler temporarily in power would not submit such substantive charges to a plebiscite of the Panamanian people. If this happened we would end up with a treaty relationship only with the dictator in power, but not with the people of Panama.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I believe that the appropriate course for the Senate is to withhold its “consent” to ratification of the treaties now before us—and to “advise” the President to persist in negotiations until acceptable treaties can be fashioned.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine (Mr. Muskie) is recognized.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Michigan.

I ask unanimous consent that Madeleine Albright, of my staff, have the privilege of the floor during the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUSKIE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a similar request?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa (Mr. Clark) is recognized.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bruce Van Voorst, of my staff, be allowed the privilege of the floor during the consideration of the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask the same privilege for Dr. Charles Horner of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask the same privilege for Mark Edelman of my staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Does the Senator from Idaho seek recognition?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho, Mr. Church.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I do not propose to present a rebuttal at this time to the arguments that have been made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan. He is a fellow member of our committee. I respect him very much, and I know that he has conscientiously presented his case.

I do think, however, that two points that he makes ought to be addressed at this time, knowing that all of the points will be discussed at considerable length and in sufficient detail in the course of the debate during the next few weeks.

Two points that I would like to respond to at this time have to do with his argument that somehow the adoption of these treaties will augment or enhance the Communist threat in Central America and Panama, as it might be directed against the canal in the future.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to understand the basis for this argument. Certainly the Communists do not agree with it. The most radical and most leftist elements in Panamanian politics are the most strident opponents of the treaties. It is hard for me to believe they think that their own interests would be advanced by the approval of these treaties. If that were so they would not be agitating against them.

Furthermore, in the course of our hearings, this question came up again and again, and I think the Record at this point should contain answers to such questions from several of our most prominent generals and admirals.

I call the Senate's attention to page 51 of part 3 of the hearings of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to a question asked by Senator Percy of Admiral Zumwalt, the former Chief of Staff of the Navy and former Chief of Naval Operations:

Senator PERCY. Finally, what do you think would be the result if we simply fail to ratify these treaties? Certainly we want to get a clarification of many of the points you want clarified; I think we all agree on that. If we simply fail to ratify, what do you perceive ahead?

Admiral Zumwalt replied:

I think the loudest cheers would be in Moscow and Havana. I think it would be a great asset, for their objective is to generate pressures to nonratify these treaties.

So Admiral Zumwalt points at once to the glee in Moscow and Havana, two centers of Communist power, in the event the Senate fails to ratify these treaties.

We also put the same question to Gen. Maxwell Taylor, former Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who stated in his testimony before the committee on October 10 as follows:

The Soviet Union always intriguing for leadership in the have-not world has taken as a primary objective the undermining of our Latin American relations, particularly those with our trade partners.

It will always assure to Panamá a large allocation of troublemakers to complicate our problems. Turbulence there is always good news to Moscow—so also are American blunders. In this connection, let us hope that we do not give the Kremlin chiefs the occasion to rejoice which our rejection of these treaties would undoubtedly afford.

In a similar vein, but turning attention to Cuba, Secretary of Defense Brown observed:

I cannot speak for Mr. Castro, but if I were Castro and I wanted to do the most I could to increase the influence of Cuba in the Caribbean and in Central and Latin America, and decrease and harm the United States psychologically, politically, and diplomatically, I would do all I could to see these treaties rejected.

So, Mr. President, I suggest that the argument that our ratification of these treaties would somehow augment a Communist threat to the canal are baseless. Indeed, a careful consideration of the position the Communists have taken suggests that the very opposite is the case. The rejection of these treaties will undoubtedly enhance Communist influence throughout Central America and weaken our influence and relations with all countries south of our borders. Such an action would be welcome news to the Communists.

The second point I would like to take up deals with the argument of the Senator from Michigan that these treaties are fatally flawed. He says that as they may relate to our crucial right of expeditious passage, to go to the head of the line in case of national emergency or need in the future, and as with respect to the unilateral rights we reserve to intervene for the purpose of maintaining the canal as an open, safe, and neutral waterway in the years ahead, there are ambiguities in the treaty. He says we should go back again to the negotiating table and begin anew.

Well, Mr. President, we have been 14 years at the negotiating table. If after that long and difficult period of hard bargaining that has extended over a period of nearly a decade and a half we cannot draft a treaty that adequately protects our interests, then on what basis could one reasonably assume that to go back to the negotiating table for more years of negotiation will produce any better result?

Mr. President, the committee wanted to be perfectly certain that there might be no possibility of argument concerning these treaties in the future in connection either with our right to intervene to maintain the canal, or with respect to our right of transit in time of need. That is why we have recommended to the Senate the adoption of two amendments. There is no possible reason why we should go back to the negotiating table when these two amendments make it as plain as language can just what our rights will be in connection with these two crucial matters in the future.

Mr. President, I would like to read the amendments and let the words speak for themselves. I defy any negotiator to go back to the conference table and come out with any clearer language.

The two provisions of the treaty which would be amended to eliminate any possible argument as to their interpretation are article IV and article VI. The Foreign Relations Committee recommends to the Senate these two articles be amended as follows, and I now am going to read into the Record the language which would be added to the respective articles of the treaty. They would become an integral part of the treaty itself.

Article IV of the treaty, if the Senate approves the amendment recommended by the committee, would have the following language added at the end of the article:

A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

That is the amendment. I do not know how language could make plainer the right of the United States to act against any aggression or threat. And if any emphasis is needed, I call the Senate's attention to the following:

"The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries"—not both acting together, but each country—"shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat"—here I call attention to the fact that any threat must, by definition, include an internal threat or an external threat, because the language is "any threat"—"to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act"—each shall have the right to act—"against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal."

Mr. President, we do not have to go back to the bargaining table. There is no plainer way to make plainer the rights that are reserved to the United States than we have done by this language. Furthermore, it is language that has been agreed to by the Government of Panama and the Government of the United States, speaking through their chief executives, and it would be copper-riveted right into the text of the treaty itself.

Now, to turn to the second amendment proposed by the Foreign Relations Committee relating to article VI.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield before he goes to the second amendment?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I think that the point the distinguished Senator from Idaho has made is extraordinarily important. It is not sufficient to simply characterize the language. We have to look at the language itself. I thank the Senator for quoting the language in full, word by word, that was recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations to be included as an amendment to article IV.

As he has pointed out, this language states that "each of the two countries shall"—each of the two countries—"in accordance with their respective constitutional processes"—their respective processes. It is not acting jointly, not together but separately and acting individually—"defend the canal against any threat"—any threat—"to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any"—against any—"aggression or threat directed against the canal or against peaceful transit of vessels through the canal."

The distinguished Senator from Idaho is absolutely right. This provision, this statement, which is to be incorporated into the treaty, is clear in giving the United States the right to act against any threat and to protect the neutrality of the canal. It provides us, the United States, with the legal and moral basis to take any action which we deem necessary in order to protect the neutrality of the canal.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much. I cannot possibly envision how the language could be interpreted in any different way. The words speak for themselves.

The committee, on page 6 of its report, explains the committee's own understanding of this provision, though, as the Senator from Maryland correctly points out, it should stand on its own. It needs no further interpretation. Nevertheless, the committee read much testimony on this point. Therefore, I think that the committee's opinion has value. I read from page 6 of the committee report with reference to the recommended amendment of article 4:

It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however the Canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the Canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. When such steps shall be taken is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act if it deems proper against any threat to the Canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or non-military. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty. They do not terminate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I shall be happy to yield if the Senator wishes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As the Senator from Idaho knows, we are imposing somewhat upon the arrangement informally agreed upon as far as the time of the distinguished Senator from Nevada is concerned. I shall wait until the Senator from Idaho completes his statement. Then I should like a minute or two for response, if I may.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator. I assure him I shall take only a few more minutes.

Article VI of the treaty deals with the matter of the transit of vessels. The committee has recommended that the Senate amend this article, again to eliminate any possibility of argument in the future. The committee's recommendations would add, at the end of article VI, the following language:

In accordance with the Statement of Understanding mentioned in Article IV above: The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly.

Again, Mr. President, I suggest that the language speaks for itself. It is susceptible to no other interpretation but that the United States shall always reserve to itself the right to see that its ships may go to the head of the line in case of national need in the future. I think that is very significant, Mr. President, that both Chief Executives, of the United States and Panama, have agreed to this interpretation and that their agreement was presented to the people of Panama by Omar Torrijos at the time of the plebiscite, so that the people of Panama were fully aware of how these two provisions had been interpreted by the two Chiefs of State. That was presented to them prior to their vote, which should eliminate any argument concerning whether or not the people of Panama knew how these crucial provisions of the treaty are interpreted by both Governments.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I think there is one other point that was made by the Senator from Michigan, who is a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the course of his opening statement, that we ought to address briefly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to respond first to the two points already argued before he proceeds to another one?

Mr. SARBANE. Surely.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Of course, we are imposing upon the Senator from Nevada, who is ready to proceed and is to be the next speaker.

First of all, perhaps the Senator from Idaho was not listening carefully, but those who did hear my statement will recall that I did not refer to "expeditious passage" or "head of the line." That was not one of the points I made at all with respect to the Carter-Torrijos statement.

I will say, however, as long as the subject has been raised, it is clear that "head of the line" treatment was not agreed to in the treaty itself. Indeed, "priority passage" was asked for the United States negotiators and was rejected, as the chief negotiator for Panama has said time and time again. Accordingly, in effect, we are making a basic change in the treaty itself by adopting an amendment which accords the United States "head of the line" status.

But, be that as it may, that was not the point I made at all. I said that despite the so-called joint agreement of General Torrijos and President Carter that there were still, obviously, two points of disagreement.

One is that we say, and I am sure that the Senator from Idaho is convinced and I do not challenge his belief concerning his interpretation or what the State Department or the Committee on Foreign Relations interpretation of that agreement is, that we would have the right in the event of any threat to the canal to go in and use military force.

For the Senator from Idaho to recite his interpretation, however, does not mean that we have an agreement with the people of Panama, or in this case even with the leaders of Panama because they say the Carter-Torrijos statement does not mean that. They say it means we can come in if the canal is threatened or attacked by a foreign power but that we have no right, if the threat is an internal threat from within Panama.

Now, we cannot make an agreement with the people of Panama by just repeating over and over again what we thing the language means. The critical point is, what do the people of Panama think it means?

In this instance, the interpretation will not be submitted to the people of Panama. We will let General Torrijos do the interpreting and he does not interpret it as we do.

The second point is that the Carter administration is taking the position and representing to the people of the country, and it is our interpretation of the Carter-Torrijos understanding, that the United States can unilaterally decide when we can go in to defend the neutrality of the Canal.

The Panamanians are not saying that. They say it means we can go in when they ask us to come in or when they agree we can come in.

Two very fundamental differences. They existed before the Carter-Torrijos statement. They still exist.

Now, let me address the other point made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho. He quoted a couple of advocates of the treaties as authority for what the Communist position is with respect to these treaties, or what they think it ought to be.

The impression was left that the Communists would oppose these treaties and that we would be playing into their hands if we do not go along with the treaties.

I am not sure we want to make our foreign policy on the basis of what the Communist Party believes—or does not believe—in any event.

But I am certainly not going to take just an undocumented opinion of somebody as to what the Communist view is.

It so happens that in Panama after General Torrijos put himself in office following the election by the people of Panama of a different leader, he did away with all the political parties in Panama except one, the Communist Party.

In the course of our hearings, it came up on several occasions as to what the position of the Communist Party in Panama was with respect to these treaties.

The State Department was asked for the answer and the State Department provided it. I will quote from the statement provided by the State Department:

The Communist Party of Panama on October 14, 1977, publicly announced its support of the new treaties, which it regards as part of a "trend toward decolonization." The party's statement is consistent with its general practice of not criticizing government policy initiatives as well as with statements by Communist Parties in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in full in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

COMMUNIST SUPPORT IN PANAMA FOR CANAL TREATIES

[Supplied by Department of State]

The Communist Party of Panama (Partido del Pueblo) on October 14, 1977, publicly announced its support of the new treaties, which it regards as part of a "trend toward decolonization." The Party's statement is consistent with its general practice of not criticizing government policy initiatives as well as with statements by Communists parties in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

The PdP, however, is known to have reservations about certain aspects of the treaties, particularly the provisions for a continued U.S. presence in Panama until the year 2000 and continued U.S. rights thereafter as provided in the Neutrality Treaty.

This provision of qualified support contrasts with the solid opposition to the treaties by Panama's major ultra-leftist, ultra-nationalist and essentially anti-U.S. student organizations, as well as from the Revolutionary Socialist League, a very small Trotskyite group.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Nevada for yielding.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to take just a moment, if the Senator from Nevada will indulge me, to address one of the points that was made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, a member of our committee, having to do with the sea-level canal.

Questions have been raised about this and I think it is very clear that the provision that has been put into the treaty, article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty, with respect to the sea-level canal, is clearly in the favor of the United States. It was put there at our insistence. I do not think there is any doubt it serves our interests.

That article states that we will not negotiate with third states for the right to construct a canal on a route outside of Panama except as we in Panama may agree. In other words, if we want to go outside Panama, it has to be agreed to. In effect, we hold ourselves to building a route through Panama. In return—in return—the Republican of Panama agrees that no new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of the treaty except as the parties may agree.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Except in accordance with the provisions of this treaty, or as the two parties may otherwise agree.

Now, in effect, what we have accomplished by that provision is precluded for the rest of this century that any other country can come into Panama, and build a canal unless we are prepared to permit that to take place. We can prevent that from happening because a canal cannot be built unless we agree to it being done.

Now, Colonel Sheffey, who is now retired, was the Executive Director of the President's Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission.

He came before our committee and in the course of his statement said the following:

As the former Executive Director of the $22 million sea-level canal study in 1965-70, I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new Isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama. The economic, technical and political objections to the far longer routes in Colombia and Nicaragua eliminate them from practical consideration. Limiting the choice to Panama for the remainder of this century costs the U.S. nothing, and the treaty proposal for this prevents other powers meddling in the matter.

The theoretically feasible routes in Nicaragua and Colombia are 140 miles and 100 miles in length, respectively, as compared with 40 miles or less for the Panamanian route. The movement of large ships in narrow canal waters is a slow and hazardous operation. Ship operators would not readily accept the risk and time lost in transit on these long routes. The construction and operation costs of these longer canals would be three or four times the cost of the shorter canals in Panama, and even the shorter Panamanian routes are not economically feasible at currently forecast traffic levels.

In the 1970 study, the Nicaraguan and Colombian routes were considered only for a sea-level canal constructed by nuclear excavation. Nuclear excavation is of questionable technical feasibility at best, and is politically infeasible beyond doubt. Conventional excavation costs on these longer routes were so great that they were not even estimated with any precision. Today's construction costs on either route would be in excess of $20 billion, and this could easily double by the time such a canal might be needed.

Certainly, the foreseeable traffic cannot support two Isthmian canals, and 95% of the world shipping forecast for the year 2000 will still be of sizes that can pass the present Panama Canal. The 5% of superships that need a larger canal cannot possibly support its cost even in Panama. The military advantages of a relatively indestructible sea-level canal are attractive, but have not moved us to build one in Panama. They are far from sufficient to justify a $20 billion investment in a technically unsatisfactory and politically abrasive canal outside Panama.

Subsequently in the question period, to be absolutely certain about the thrust of his testimony, the following colloquy was held with Colonel Sheffey:

Senator SARBANES. Let me ask a question about the sea level canal.

I take it that you support the provisions of the treaty with respect to the sea level canal?

Colonel SHEFFEY. Yes, 100 percent, Senator.

The argument that we need the right to build a canal outside Panama for some unforeseen purpose is an empty one. We cannot build a canal outside Panama.

When we entered this study in 1965, one of our purposes was to prove that we could build a canal, a technically satisfactory canal, outside Panama because it would give us far better negotiating leverage to renegotiate our relationship with Panama.

We spent $22 million of the taxpayers money in 5 years and proved only that we could not build outside Panama.

At that time, there was a very large measure of optimism that we could construct a canal with nuclear excavation. We found that nuclear excavation is probably not technically feasible, although we were unable to prove it one way or the other because of the limitations on testing. We know beyond my doubt that for the foreseeable future it is politically infeasible because you cannot excavate with nuclear explosives without spreading radiation over very large areas.

We also found that these long routes outside Panama just did not lend themselves to practical canals. They are too long, too winding, too difficult to navigate to make a practical canal.

Senator SARBANES. So, what we give up is that right to build a sea level canal outside Panama, and we are really not giving up anything.

Colonel SHEFFEY. It is giving up nothing whatever, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SARBANES. The Panamanians, as I understand it, give up at least the right to allow some other power to come into Panama to build a canal.

Colonel SHEFFEY. It is an extremely valuable quid pro quo. We are getting something for nothing.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, with the concurrence of the Senator from Nevada, I will take another 30 seconds to respond to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

First of all, the provisions of article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty are rather brief and very easy to read; and I urge anyone interested in this subject to get a copy and read it. You do not have to be, as I said, a lawyer or even have taken a course in law to understand what it says.

In very clear and unambiguous terms, the United States gives up the right even to negotiate with other nations to build a canal anywhere outside of Panama.

The Senator from Maryland focused upon some language in article XII which he says means that Panama will not be able to build a second canal in Panama in collaboration with any nation other than the United States. This is what that language says:

No interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this treaty or as the two parties shall otherwise agree.

Obviously, there are two ways it can be done: First, the two parties may agree; or second, if pursued "in accordance with the provisions of this treaty."

What does that mean—to be in accordance with the provisions of this treaty? That is pretty ambiguous and fuzzy language. It seems very strange to me that good lawyers negotiating these treaties, who had no trouble finding language to pin down the United States, could not find better and clearer language to spell out the obligation of Panama.

I guess one can argue as the Senator from Maryland has; but frankly there is a very good argument on the other side. Or is that all Panama has to do to be "in accordance with the treaty" is to fulfill its obligations under the treaty with respect to the construction of a new canal. And what are they? They are to "study jointly" and to "negotiate." Negotiating does not mean you have to agree. All you have to do is to negotiate. If Panama studies and negotiates, they can say "We complied with the treaty," and go ahead.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. GRIFFIN. At least, it is ambiguous. Will the Senator agree to that?

Mr. SARBANES. No; I absolutely do not concede that it is ambiguous.

The point that the Senator has just made might be a good point if the word "agreeable" were not in there but paragraph 1 of article XII, talks about negotiating terms agreeable to both parties.

That paragraph states:

Both parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea-level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms agreeable to both parties for its construction.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Great. In the event they agree, that is great. That really pins them down; does it not?

Mr. SARBANES. That provision "agreeable to both parties" gives us control. If it is not agreeable to both parties, it cannot be done by the other party. We control it. Panama cannot permit some other nation to build a canal if we are opposed to that happening.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Nevada, to continue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt) is recognized.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding.

I also look forward with great pleasure to working with the Senator from Michigan during the course of the next several weeks in opposing vigorously the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

Mr. President, as we begin the historic debate on the Panama Canal treaties, I believe it is important that we pause for a moment to clear the air. I think that before we get too deeply involved in what will almost certainly be a lengthy and heated debate, we should be certain as to just what we are discussing and how we should go about approaching it.

Quite simply, we are discussing the future of the Panama Canal which Adm. Thomas Moorer has referred to as one of the four major maritime gateways of the world, a waterway of the same level of importance as the Molacca Straits, the Suez Canal, and the Gibraltar Strait. The canal itself is approximately 50 miles long, contains three sets of locks, transits on an annual basis approximately 14,000 oceangoing vessels and is surrounded on both sides by a 10-mile strip of U.S. territory known as the Canal Zone.

How did the United States come to obtain sovereignty over the Canal Zone? Although this issue is essentially extraneous, it has been made a centerpiece of the proponents' position. Treaty proponents, in effect, argue that the United States obtained the zone in a classic exercise of gunboat diplomacy and because the age of colonialism is over, the United States should give up this colonial outpost. Reference was made to this effect the other evening, in the fireside chat, by none other than the President.

In fact, as I told the Foreign Relations Committee during my testimony on this matter, our presence in the Canal Zone is in no way colonial. Indeed, after we had all but decided on another route, the Panamanians asked us to come in in order to secure the economic benefits which the zone would provide. Panama is a prosperous, independent nation today because of U.S. expenditures in building and maintaining the canal.

Prior to concluding a canal treaty with Panama in 1903, the United States had studied several possible canal routes and had Panama not revolted and declared its independence from Colombia, the canal would have been constructed in Nicaragua. The independence movement in Panama in 1903, which was directed against Colombia, was for the expressed purpose in Panama in 1903, which was directed against Colombia, was for the expressed purpose of negotiating a treaty directly with the United States in order to head off the imminent Nicaraguan route. The Panamanians, at that time, realized that their best chance of surmounting their fate as a poverty-stricken, disease-ridden province of Colombia lay with the construction of the canal.

Nor, has there been any exploitation by the United States of Panama. Quite the contrary. Panama has prospered, because of the canal to a degree far greater than any other nation in Central America. Since 1904, the United States has invested over $7 billion in improving the canal facilities and the defense sites.

But, rather than spend a lengthy period discussing canal history which has been examined in great detail in hearings before the three Senate committees, I would instead like to discuss the broader questions of how I feel the Senate should approach debate on the treaties presently before us.

It seems to me that we need first to establish the standard by which the treaties should be judged. Then, it is vital that we look carefully in a balanced and reasonable way to determine that combination of strategic, diplomatic, and economic factors which we can fairly judge to make up the national interest of the United States in this matter.

In my judgment, on the canal treaty question, the proponents have performed a rather adroit reversal of typical legislative procedure. As my colleagues well know, the burden of proof in legislative matters lies with those doing the proposing. Thus, it is incumbent on anyone who wishes an affirmative vote of the U.S. Senate to present a clear and convincing case as to why the Senate should decide in his favor. Rather than present us with such a case, the proponents have turned to those of us who oppose ratification and confronted us with the question, "Why not?" This, to me, is the wrong way for us to approach this debate.

A second criticism which has been leveled at those of us who oppose the treaties confuses the question of who is to apply to this standard. I have heard many times that should the Senate reject the treaties, this would be tantamount to some kind of rejection of the President of the United States which would seriously impair his ability to conduct our foreign policy. In my view, this is simply not the case. The fact is that under our constitutional processes the current President, as every President before him, has only the power to negotiate. He has absolutely no power to bind. That is the function of the people acting through their representatives in the U.S. Senate. As far as our role is concerned, we should never be placed in a position of being a rubber stamp, because this would be a complete derogation of our constitutional responsibilities. We need to apply to our constitutional function to advise and consent our independent knowledge and the unique inputs each of us receives from our constituencies.

With that in mind, it seems to me that three basic questions should be asked as we approach these historic treaties. These are the same three questions which I discussed in my testimony on this matter before the Committee on Foreign Relations on October 5, 1977. What do these treaties represent in a broader sense for our Nation, what specifically do they say, and how is the administration going about selling them to the American people?

WHAT THE TREATIES REPRESENT

First of all, what do these treaties represent for us as a nation? Needless to say, this is a question which has been hotly disputed in the many hours of committee hearings. But, to me, the proposed treaties represent a grievous risk of loss within 22 years and an almost certain loss after that time of a vital strategic and economic asset for the United States. They also set a defeatist tone for our overall foreign policy which is unworthy of our people and which we will likely be a long time living down.

International politics, in general, is a notoriously treacherous business where the motivations and credibility of potential partners must be carefully assessed. If anything, this is even more true for the proposed canal treaties where the essence of the proposed agreement is a valuable piece of commercial and strategic real estate being traded for paper promises of future use. Here the character of the man and nature of the regime offering us these assurances is of particular importance. It is critical that we determine the nature and character of the partner with whom we are going to bed on these treaties.

Mr. President, I suggest in this uncertain world that we need, in general, to be very careful in selecting those upon whom we rely on basic security matters. And, what is more, when it comes to international partners, the present Panamanian regime is hardly one in which I would repose a lot of confidence, much less the guardianship of a vital U.S. asset.

General Torrijos' connections to Havana and, by extension Moscow, are well-documented. As a result, what we are doing, in essence, is relinquishing control over a vital international waterway to an unstable dictator who is a close confidant of Fidel Castro, and that does not come to me by way of hearsay evidence. In response to a direct question to the general he admitted, to his credit, that he is a close friend of Fidel Castro, that he has relied upon him for advice in the past.

It is naive for us to conclude in our deliberations here that we are dealing with anything else but a close relationship from every standpoint between General Torrijos and Fidel Castro.

With Castro as a Soviet catspaw doing most of the immediate work, the vacuum created by our withdrawal from the Canal Zone will be rapidly filled. When you think about it, if Cuba, at Soviet instigation, would send 17,000 troops into Africa to interfere in the internal affairs of that continent, can we seriously question the fact that once we pull out of Panama, located only a few hundred miles from Cuba, that Panama will not be subjected to the same type of invasion or infiltration?

To me, it is naive to think that that is not a very real possibility.

Admiral Moorer, in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee, cited the weakness and instability of Panama as well as the closeness of Torrijos to Moscow and Havana, to argue ably that U.S. departure from the Canal Zone would inevitably create a vacuum which would be quickly filled by the Soviet Union and by Cuba. As a result, he stressed that a confrontation over the neutrality of the canal, once the United States withdraws, will be transformed into a confrontation with the Soviet Union rather than any rag-tag group of Panamanian guerrillas or terrorists. We should remember that on this question we are not playing chess on a country club porch. We are playing international hardball. Anytime we delude ourselves to the contrary, we are inviting serious difficulties.

As important as the credibility of the Torrijos regime is in assessing the context of the treaties and as dangerous as the political vacuum would be should we withdraw, of equal importance is the message which Senate acceptance of these treaties would send to our allies and adversaries around the world. On this matter, I fully agree with Secretary of State Vance, who said in his statement opening the Foreign Relations Committee hearings:

How we respond to an issue such as the Panama Canal will help set the tone of our relations with the rest of the world for some time to come?

Where I differ with the Secretary, of course, is the kind of tone which I believe these treaties will set for our foreign policy. We are told that we must ratify the treaties because to do so would improve our Latin American relationships in particular. I suggest, Mr. President, that Latin America is far more interested in keeping the canal open than in our capitulation to Torrijos. Our neighbors to the south have a vital economic stake in the situation and they know Torrijos. And Senator Garn, during the course of the debates next week will speak directly to that based upon direct conversations with the heads of state in that part of the world.

The people down there know the administrative and economic difficulties with Torrijos and, in private, they are most uncomfortable with the prospect of his running a canal which is vital to their economic interests.

We are told by the proponents that we must ratify the Panama Canal Treaties in order to improve the general tenure of our relations not only with Latin America but worldwide. Somehow, if we approve these treaties, the world will suddenly commend us for being generous and beneficent. I suggest that just the opposite is true. History has taught us certainly that we cannot buy friendship on an international level anymore than we can buy it personally or privately. On the contrary, all one needs to do is observe the antics of the Third World in the United Nations. The more we help, the more they seem compelled to give us a hard time.

So this to me is senseless logic and the worst premise in the world on which to make a vital decision of this kind. It is my view, traveling around this country a bit and traveling around the world, that we are losing our respect, because of this type of behavior. And, I think our friends would view Senate ratification of the proposed treaties with contempt and pity. Particularly, the Latin Americans. As a Latin, I think I know something about their psychology. They love macho and glorify in it. On the other hand, they detest weakness and I have a sneaking suspicion that this is how they would perceive our ratification of these treaties.

The big boy backed down.

In fact, it is difficult to see how they could perceive ratification in any other way. The proponents' position boils down to proposing to give away an important piece of real estate for the pure and simple reason that when push comes to shove, we do not think that we can hold it. The proponents cite fears of sabotage and guerrilla warfare and the alienation of Latin American opinion. The military leaders among them even draw distinction between concepts of possession and use of the canal. But, the essence of their position is that because the United States is not physically able to maintain its sovereignty over the Canal Zone, we should relinquish it before it is taken away from us by a country with 2,000 national guard troops.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAXALT. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Frank Church).

Mr. LAXALT. I hope there are not going to be too many interruptions. We saw fit not to interrupt the statements of the proponents.

Mr. CHURCH. We have the debate going now and we cannot debate this treaty under rules that prevent or preclude Senators from raising questions when assertions are made that need to be challenged.

Mr. LAXALT. I recognize all that, but we did operate initially here on the basis that we would devote these 3 days to general statements of position with debate on the specific provisions to commence when we come back from the recess. I have no objections to a debate. But we are changing ground rules. We are interfering with the time of other Senators who are going to speak after me. That is my only reservation, I say to Senator Church.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I never agreed, nor do I know of any understanding that Senators may not engage in the traditional debate that does occur in the Senate.

Mr. LAXALT. I would be the last to defy the conventions of this body.

Mr. CHURCH. Interventions of this kind must occur; otherwise we are simply going to have pro forma orations made to the public radio, which is hardly the kind of debate that I think a matter of this importance deserves.

When the Senator says that the proponents of this treaty are urging it upon the Senate on the grounds that we are being forced to do it, that we are bending the knee, so to speak, to tiny Panama that we are acting under threats of coercion or blackmail—that was the essence of the Senator's argument—I must strongly disagree, for this is not the reason that I support the treaties if they are amended as the committee recommends, I support the treaties for just the opposite reason: That our security will be enhanced if we ratify the treaties, simply because it is obviously easier to preserve an open space, a neutral canal, in a climate of friendship and cooperation, than it is in a climate of hostility.

That is not an act of genuflection before Omar Torrijos, who will not even be in charge of Panama by the turn of the century when the actual transfer of the canal occurs. So I hardly see the relevance of that particular argument.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield? Will the Senator yield?
Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. Are you contending, then, as a proponent of these treaties, as a factor for us to consider, that all possible fighting and aggression within Panama should be disregarded and be moot, as far as our future there is concerned?

Mr. CHURCH. No, not at all. I am suggesting that the Senate should consider, in a reasonable way, the climate affecting the security of the canal. Certainly the security of the canal is the paramount question.

As to the question whether the treaties would enhance or impede the security of the canal, I put exactly that question to General McAuliffe. This is my question:

Is it your opinion, General Brown, and also yours, General McAuliffe—

Both General McAuliffe and General Brown were at the witness table, at the time—

That the security of the canal would be enhanced or be impeded by these treaties?

This is what General McAuliffe replied:

If I may answer, Senator, in my judgment, our capacity to keep the canal open and in use for our country and the countries of the free world will be enhanced, considerably enhanced, by the provisions of the treaties. I say that because of the factors that I enumerated in my prepared statement. The heart of it is really having a friendly environment around the canal in which to operate, and we can do all of our defense tasks better in a friendly rather than in a hostile environment.

I am sure the Senator from Nevada would not suggest that General McAuliffe is a man who would bend his knee to the Panamanians, or would not stand up stolidly and defend the canal under any circumstances. But he is an enlightened and reasonable general, and he said:

My duty to protect the canal would be enhanced by these treaties, not impeded.

Then I put the question to General Brown:

As Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, would you agree?

He said:

I would agree, Senator Church.

So I simply would hope that if it is the security of the canal we are concerned about, we ought to at least heed the testimony of the men who are charged with the responsibility of the defense of that canal, the commander of our own forces in Panama.

Mr. LAXALT. May I say to the Senator I happened to be in Panama myself, and the impression I had rather clearly was to the effect that we presently have in the force in Panama sufficient troops to quell any serious disturbance.

And may I suggest further that the reason why we are talking about violence and suggested terrorist and guerrilla activity is because the proponents of this treaty—and I am not referring to the Senator from Idaho; I know he does not suggest anything of this kind—but there have been statements made by members of the administration all around this country indicating that if we do not give up the canal, we are going to have difficulties, therefore we should give up the canal. That has been the position of the proponents around this country, and it is absolutely wrong.

In addition, it is incomprehensible to me that it can be seriously suggested that we are going to be in a better defense situation of the Panama Canal when we are out of control, rather than being in control. I do not follow that argument at all. Who can seriously contend that this country is not going to be in a superior position militarily and defensewise to protect that facility if we are in control there, rather than the Panamanians?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, there is a very good answer to that question. I would refer back again to General McAuliffe. At the time, members of the Foreign Relations Committee, including myself, were in Panama meeting with him and obtaining the briefing, he made the point very emphatically—and as to this I am sure the Senator from Nevada would be in full agreement—when he said:

I am not concerned about a military threat to the canal that takes the form of guerrilla warfare and substantial military force.

He said:

We can, with sufficient reinforcement, preserve the canal, maintain it as an open channel through which to put our fleets, if we deploy sufficient troops for that purpose. It is a small area; we can erect a shield on either side which would prevent it from being taken over by any force likely to be available or in that area for that purpose, from any force likely to be launched in Panama or Central America or anywhere thereabouts.

That was not the question that concerned the general.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield? That is the question.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me finish, because I am quoting General McAuliffe. He said:

I have no doubt that with sufficient forces, we can keep the canal open against that kind of military aggression.

But he said:

What is the purpose of the canal? The purpose is not to establish an enormous fortification there, with 50,000 American troops standing arm-in-arm to prevent some force from wresting the canal away from us. Certainly the Panamanians do not possess that strength. The purpose of the canal is to be a peaceful, secure, safe passageway for the merchant ships of the world.

Ninety-nine point nine percent of the time that is how the canal is used. That is how the canal confers its benefits. That is what the canal was built for. In times of national emergency—

Mr. LAXALT. And that is precisely how it has been operated for over half a century, without any problems whatsoever.

Mr. CHURCH. There has been trouble in the past. There has been gun fighting in the streets, and the slaughter of Americans, because of this trouble. It is quite incorrect to say there has been no trouble before. There has.

Times change, Senator. Nationalism exists in Panama. They, too, have their pride.

Mr. LAXALT. I would point out to you, too, that I am getting a little tired of constantly hearing about Panamanian pride. There is American pride, too.

Mr. CHURCH. Which we share.

Mr. LAXALT. Millions of Americans wonder what is happening to this country when you subjugate the interests of this country to what is called Panamanian pride.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, that is an absurd statement. It is just possible that American interests can be enhanced by taking into account the pride of the Panamanian people.

Mr. LAXALT. I have no quarrel with that, just so we do not give them the entire facility and pay them several billion dollars in tribute beyond that.

Mr. CHURCH. Senator, if we can finish with the security of the canal, we can debate the economics at an appropriate time.

General McAuliffe said the purpose of the canal, and I think we should all agree, is a peaceful passageway for the commerce of the world.

Mr. LAXALT. Does anyone seriously question——

Mr. CHURCH. May I just complete General McAuliffe's argument?

Mr. LAXALT. Surely.

Mr. CHURCH. After all, he is the commanding general there and does have the responsibility to keep the canal secure.

Mr. LAXALT. And he is responsible to the Commander in Chief, who supports these treaties.

Mr. CHURCH. And he is also an honest man.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not question that for a moment. But I would like to see what General McAuliffe's secret ballot would be on these treaties if we could get it from him.

Mr. CHURCH. I have no doubt as to how General McAuliffe would cast his vote because he told me personally afterward: "Senator," he said, "these are treaties that the military has been for, that we have worked for, for years." He said, "When I give it my endorsement, I give you my personal assurance that this is my personal belief."

Mr. LAXALT. If he did that, he would be flying in the face of almost a universal consensus of retired flag officers in this country.

I would like to yield the floor for just a moment to Senator Garn.

Mr. CHURCH. If I may just complete my thought——

Mr. GARN. If the Senator will yield to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. LAXALT. I have yielded to the Senator from Utah for a moment or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. I will allow my distinguished colleague to finish his opening statement, which I believe most people will agree to.

I would like to ask the Senator if I could get a brief response to one thing: The Senator has made a statement over and over again about signing these treaties and he has quoted General McAuliffe how it would be easier to defend with a friendly group in Panama. There is no doubt about it. It would insult anybody's intelligence to assume otherwise.

From a military standpoint, I think it strains my imagination to think that the mere signing of these treaties guarantees friendliness within the Panama Canal Zone. I think it is a very naive position to assume that. With the conditions down there, General Torrijos is going to be just about as much trouble if the treaties are passed as the expectations if they do not pass. I think it is ridiculous to assume that the treaties guarantee that we will have friendly relations, or some future dictator who replaces General Torrijos does not try one-upmanship. "Let's see if we can threaten them again in 5 years and see if we can squeeze a little more out."

Mr. CHURCH. My reply to the Senator from Utah is, of course, that no mortal can guarantee the future. I have not said at any point in this debate that the ratification of these treaties means that all of our problems in Panama, or elsewhere in Latin America, are solved. But I think it is a fair statement to say that most of the knowledgeable people in Latin America, most of the historians who have followed relations between the United States and her Latin neighbors, are in full agreement that these treaties are very likely to produce better feelings toward the United States owing to the long festering resentment on the part of Panamanians to our occupation of the Canal Zone, our control, our jurisdiction, our laws, our police, our courts, all of which to Latin Americans represents a colonial anachronism.

I took the floor to point out that in the matter of the canal's use, which is the important thing, General McAuliffe was not concerned at our inability to hold back substantial military threat. He said, "The things we cannot do is to prevent a continuous harassment of the use of the canal if a hostile climate develops."

He made this very clear. He said there is no way, with the jungles on either side of the canal to prevent the lobbing of mortar shells into the area. There is no way to prevent sniper fire. If it occurs intermittently, if it constitutes a threat to passing vessels, in that situation what happens to the commerce in the canal? Are ships going to move through knowing that intermittent rifle fire, that harassment, will continue in that unfriendly climate? Is the captain going to expose himself on the deck where he might be shot from the jungle? This kind of security cannot be furnished by any military force.

This is the principle benefit of the canal, its use to the United States and to the merchant fleets of the world. That kind of use cannot be guaranteed by an American military force of any size, which is the reason that General McAuliffe, our commanding officer in Panama, says that the treaties will enhance the security and the use of the canal and not impede that security.

Mr. GARN. I do not want to impinge further upon the time of my colleague, but let me say we will be debating that at great length at the proper time. I happen to be a member of the Armed Services Committee, and the Armed Services Committee is charged with the specific responsibility of authorizations to the Armed Forces of this country. I think we may have looked at it more critically. Though I would like to respond today, during the weeks to come expect me to be here refuting much of what the Senator has said today.

I would suggest in preparation the Senator might read the testimony of military officers, including members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, before the Armed Services Committee. He will find some rather interesting things which are stated there. Just two examples rather quickly: Admiral Holloway testified that if he had his "druthers," and we lived in a perfect world and we did not have these threats down here, from a military standpoint he would much rather keep it in perpetuity; he would much rather keep defense positions there, and people. It would be much easier to defend. That is the testimony of the Joint Chiefs of Staff before our committee.

When I asked him about the differences between retired flag and general officers and what he thought would be the results if we had a secret poll of active duty flag and general officers, he said it would be about the same, with the caveat that, of course, they were not as intimately involved in the details as negotiators as the Joint Chiefs, that they did not know as much about it. We are going to talk a great deal more about this defense.

I would just make one more statement. It would be rather interesting if the Armed Services Committee had jurisdiction over this treaty. It would have never reached the floor of the Senate. I do not know exactly what the vote would have been, but I would guarantee on the very defense issues we are talking about, looking at it from a military and defense standpoint, it would never have reached the Senate floor and would not if we held a vote on it today.

Mr. CHURCH. I have read the report of the committee.

Mr. GARN. The time belongs to Senator Laxalt. I will yield back to him.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHURCH. If I may respond briefly to the statements of the Senator from Utah, then I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. LAXALT. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I have read the record of the testimony before the Armed Services Committee. On this very point General McAuliffe, testifying before the Armed Services Committee, had this to say when Senator McIntyre asked the following question:

Your thought would be, if we do run into real difficulty—I certainly hope we don't—you need in the vicinity of 50,000 troops to maintain the security of the canal over that period?

General McAuliffe replied as follows:

That is correct; and I should add this, in my judgment, to prevent what I would call the destruction of the canal. However, even with that sizable force or a larger one, I would say that unless extraordinary measures are permitted, such as moving across the national boundaries, there is no way that I could prevent the interruption of that canal, and the reason I say that, if I may use an illustration, the Canal Zone boundary is only 5 miles from the centerline of the canal. The exceptions are in the lake area. One can easily visualize, again, if there is a hostile Panama, visualize the use of standoff weapons only 5 miles away, and they wouldn't have to hit very much in the canal or in the Canal Zone, but they would terrorize the employees and probably stop commercial shipping, and that is whether they sink a ship or not.

That is the point. The use of the canal, by our general in charge, would be enhanced by the treaties.

Mr. GARN. I would only say there is more testimony of General McAuliffe later on in response to questions by the Senator from Utah about the vulnerability. I will not take any more time of my distinguished colleague. Later on we will discuss the rest of the testimony.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAXALT. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, it was this Senator's understanding that we are not going to have debate this evening. I have been over in my office preparing this short statement. There are other Senators sitting around. I wonder if we might let the Senators make their statements today and then have our argument later. I believe we have extended the courtesy so far. I hope that all Senators might give the other Senators an opportunity to have their opening statements.

Mr. LAXALT. I might indicate to the Senator from Virginia that that proposal has been made and it has met with an eminent lack of success. I have no objection to this. The opponents feel the debate should be kept current with the topical discussions as they arise.

For the purpose of the record, while we are on this point, may I read the testimony of Admiral Moorer before the Armed Services Committee. For those who may not be familiar with his background, as everybody knows, he served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs, retired, is as highly respected as anybody in this country in this field and, more importantly than anything else, is totally independent of any form of political pressure. He can tell it like it is.

Admiral Moorer indicated in his testimony:

The proponents of these treaties proclaim again and again that the only way to handle the internal threat is to ratify the treaties and give up the Canal. It is repeated over and over again that we are not interested in ownership, only continued use, which can be acquired only with the help of the Panamanians. Otherwise, they say, 100,000 troops will be required to defend the canal and we will immediately be plunged into another Vietnam. I do not accept any of these scare statements. In the first place, a major part of the income of Panama is due directly to the existence of an operating canal. If the Panamanians make an effort to sabotage the canal they are the ones that will be harmed. Most of them know this.

I should like to carry on now with what remains of my prepared statement.

Referring back to the violence argument, which initiated the recent discussion, this violence argument is worthy of detailed comment. Ambassador Linowitz stated it in perhaps the clearest way when he said in a Voice of America broadcast:

Expectations have been raised so high in Latin America that failure to get the treaties ratified could bring a whole range of consequences including violence.

Raised by whom? People like Sol Linowitz, making statements to this effect.

I do not believe that the issue of potential violence should be ignored. But, I do believe we need to inquire closely as to its origins. To me, the treaties represent the worst possible way of dealing with potential security threats to the canal from within Panama. The expectations of Panamanian extremists have certainly been raised by the prospect of their taking over the canal. But treaty proponents need to ask themselves whether those expectations would be satisfied by extremists being asked to wait 22 years or whether violence and sabotage are now possible irrespective of Senate ratification, simply because of the atmosphere of heightened expectations which the treaties create without really satisfying.

I might say on this point that Senator Dole and I, when we traveled to Panama, made it abundantly clear to the Panamanian people through their press that the rejection of the treaties by this body would not be a rejection of the Panamanian people per se. It would be simply a rejection of very bad treaties, which we felt were not in the best interest of this country.

Robert Gomez, the secretary general of the Federal Panamanian Students, perhaps put the extremist position best in a speech last fall when he said:

Contrary to what many think, the new agreement will not and cannot signal the end of the process or of the struggle for national liberation. Hail the unity of the patriotic forces and support for the liberating process; the struggle against imperialism and its internal allies will be continuous and prolonged. No one and nothing can stop it.

It was rather frightening to me when we asked General Torrijos, what if we reject the treaties; will you have control of this situation? He candidly admitted that perhaps he would not.

In view of this tinderbox situation, I see Senate refusal to ratify as providing at least some deterrence to violence by demonstrating that the power of the United States remains behind its legitimate interests. Ratification of a halfway house treaty, on the other hand, because it represents a clear capitulation under threat of force without satisfying extremist expectations would be a signal to potential rioters and saboteurs that they need not wait 22 years. All they need do is push just a little harder because the United States would have clearly demonstrated its willingness to succumb to violence. Then it would be open season for extremists to attack not only the canal but the property and persons of U.S. nationals throughout Latin America.

Let us discuss for a moment what the treaties say.

The terms of the treaties are no better than the overall tone which they set for American foreign policy, in my opinion. I am opposed to the front-end concession of the key principle of sovereignty.

Whether or not we would contend that there is sovereignty, which is an open legal question, I believe that the initial admission that not only do we have sovereignty now but we have never had it can be critically damaging.

I believe the rapid turnover of crucial support services to the Panamanians bodes ill for the effective operation of the canal. I think the human rights of Americans left in the Zone and our ability to guarantee the neutrality of the canal are inadequately protected under the terms of this treaty. It is, to me, an absolute scandal that we are proposing to pay the Panamanians what amounts to tribute to take the Canal off our hands.

With regard to sovereignty, the main purpose of the treaty is hardly concealed. The preamble to the agreement opens by "acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory." Quite clearly, at the very core of the nature of the present relationship between the United States and the Panama Canal is our own sovereignty over the Canal and Canal Zone. In my judgment, it would be bad enough if this new treaty confined itself to passing sovereignty to the Panamanian Government. But, as I read the existing language, it recognizes that Panama already has sovereignty. Thus, the Panamanians could presumably exercise their right to expel the United States from their country whenever they desire. Accordingly, in these agreements, we are not only giving away our canal, we are asserting that we have never had it.

President Carter has stated that we have never had sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone. This is simply a distortion of the facts. The 1903 Convention between the United States and Panama gave the U.S. sovereign rights over the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone "in perpetuity" and "to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

Indeed, the question of U.S. sovereignty was debated and put to rest by the Supreme Court in 1970 (Wilson v. Shaw 204 U.S. 24 (1970)) and as recently as 1972 (U.S. v. Husband R 406 U.S. 935 (1972)).

Initially, the United States paid the new Republic of Panama $10 million for the transfer of territory, assumed the annual obligations of the Panama Railroad and purchased its entire stock. We also purchased all privately held lands within the zone even those of squatters. All told, by the time of the completion of the canal in 1914, the United States had paid upwards of $54 million in acquisition costs to Panama, the French company, and private landowners. Later, we even settled with Colombia under the Thompson-Urrutia Treaty of 1922.

Mr. President, quite literally, we provided fair compensation to anyone having even the pretense of a just claim. We did buy it. We did pay for it. And it is ours.

EFFECTIVE CANAL OPERATION

Despite some obvious disputes over the running of the canal, particularly reflected in demands by Panama over the years for more revenue and control of the canal, nearly everyone agrees that the Panama Canal Company has skillfully maintained an extraordinarily safe, fair and efficient operation. It has made a major contribution to the development of world trade and preserved our own security interests in the Western Hemisphere.

In scrutinizing the terms of the new agreement, I cannot help but wonder whether the operation will continue in the same equitable and efficient manner in the future. Article X requires that the American workforce must "within five years * * * be at least 20 percent less than the total number" of those working there at present. And, under section four of the same article, new non-Panamanian employees can only work for terms of 5 years duration (aside from some special circumstances). Thus, discrimination is mandated in the treaty against the very personnel whose qualifications are necessary for the continued operation of the canal.

Quite simply, Panama does not now have, and cannot have within the short period of time required, the skilled personnel to fill adequately the jobs of those who will leave their present jobs, whether voluntarily or under duress.

The mechanisms of the canal do not operate by means of good feelings or improved relationships with Latin America. Rather, the canal, as an international waterway, requires the skillful manipulation of a complex series of gates and locks. Yet, many of the U.S. employees have stated that if the treaties are ratified they will return to America and not stay to train Panamanian replacements. Jobs such as the ships' captains that navigate the vessels through the canal now require 20 years of training and experience. Panama does not have such qualified people. At present, only 2 out of the 200 ships' captains are Panamanians. Until recently, no school even existed in Panama to train ship's captains and the country has virtually no navy. Nonetheless, the treaty requires that Panama assume control of an increasingly large portion of the skilled jobs in the operation of the canal.

And the question goes deeper than ability to one of willingness. Let us not shrink from the facts. The government of General Torrijos is shot through with mismanagement. Major management projects such as the new airport and Contadora resort island have failed utterly. Have we any reason to think Torrijos would prove either better able or more willing to handle the far greater challenge of running the multibillion dollar canal operation than these other tasks?

To make matters worse, the United States does not even have the option of building an alternative canal if the proposed arrangement with Panama does work out in practice. Under article XII, the United States is prohibited from negotiating "with third states for the right to construct an interoceanic canal * * * in the Western Hemisphere" without the consent of the Panamanian Government. Thus, even if there is an uprising and the canal is closed, Panama holds an absolute veto power over the United States pursuing an alternative route for the next 22 years.

HUMAN RIGHTS

The worst fears of the workers who now live in the Panama Canal Zone are fully realized under the terms of the proposed treaty. In all the discussion of alleged grievances and rights of Panama, we have curiously ignored the rights of the American citizens and perhaps equally tragic, those of the Panamanian employees of the Panama Canal Company, who live in the Canal Zone. In the treaty, we consciously expand Torrijos' authoritarian rule to include the zone without ever raising a question about the abysmal human rights record of this regime and its consequences for those who live and work there.

Under article XI, section 2, Panama does permit the United States to continue to have the "primary right to exercise criminal jurisdiction over the U.S. citizens employees" of the canal, their dependents and other American military forces. But, this protection is limited to only certain areas and, most importantly, lasts only for the transition period of 30 months. After this period of time, these people fall completely under Panamanian legal jurisdiction.

The human rights question must be squarely faced. The zonians have lived under the mantel of freedom provided by the United States in the Panama Canal Zone. Are they now to be abandoned? As I learned during a recent visit to the Canal Zone, simply in anticipation of the new agreement many employees have already left the area and in a 3-year period this emigration is predicted to turn into a flood.

The administration's quest for human rights in the international area is certainly laudable. Yet, I must object when that same administration proposes to turn the civil rights of many thousands of American citizens and even more U.S. Government workers over to a dictator.

SECURITY GUARANTEES

Presumably, to protect the U.S. vital security interests, a separate treaty provides for the permanent neutrality of the canal. Thus far, this entire section has been enveloped in a conflict of interpretations between American and Panamanian negotiators. If disputes have arisen before the agreement is even ratified, this certainly bodes ill for its prospective implementation.

In the discussion thus far concerning American rights under the Permanent Neutrality Treaty, the Panamanians have made a much more convincing case for their position. Rather than a genuinely joint declaration, the Panamanians have insisted that since the main treaty acknowledges their sovereignty over the canal, they alone can declare the neutrality of the waterway. And, under article I of the second treaty, the language indicates only that "The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal * * * shall be permanently neutral." Thus, if Panama alone can declare neutrality, then unless other specific language indicates otherwise, the United States has no right under the treaty to proclaim unilaterally a threat to that neutrality and intervene to thwart such a threat.

Article IV of the neutrality treaty has been cited as a basis for the American right to intervention. This article does allude to both the United States and Panama agreeing "to maintain the regime of neutrality established under this treaty." The last four words of this quote clearly mean the kind of neutrality that Panama has declared already in the treaty and not an American right to determine this.

Thus, it is entirely understandable that General Torrijos in a speech to a Student Federation Congress in Panama on September 15, 1977, stated that:

I am not afraid, nor am I denying, that we signed a clause which if misinterpreted by future U.S. generations could give place to intervention. But, I am not afraid because I know the youth that we are producing. And, in order for there to be intervention, there must be a people willing to accept intervention, and these people have no intention of accepting it.

The language of the Panamanian view of what this agreement does could hardly be more specific.

Many other Senators share my concern with the meaning of the Neutrality Treaty. In this light, the Foreign Relations Committee has recommended an incorporation of the October 14, 1977, Statement of Understanding between Carter and Torrijos as part of the treaty. Frankly, even if this statement was made part of the treaty, the problem of interpretation is not solved. Without another Panamanian plebiscite, it is unclear whether this statement is even legal and binding upon both parties. As Senator Griffin indicated General Torrijos on returning to Panama after the October meeting with Carter, stated, "I haven't even signed an autograph." Certainly, this statement at least suggests a lack of legal validity.

Furthermore, the Carter-Torrijos Statement declares that the rights of the United States do not extend to intervention in the "internal affairs of Panama." What course of action would then be open to us if the canal's neutrality was threatened from forces within Panama?

The October 14 statement also grants the United States "expeditions" crossing of the canal, that is, we may "go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly." Of course, being at the "head of the line" does not guarantee that a Panamanian-controlled workforce will actually push the levers and open the gates to get us through the canal.

On this point, as well as many others, the most lucid discussion that has thus far appeared of the nature and direction of the negotiations has derived from the Panamanians. They have indicated that the original language proposed by American negotiators was unacceptable to them, and, ultimately, on the crucial issues they have prevailed. I cannot help but conclude, as the Panamanians have, that even with the understanding incorporated, the United States, under the terms of the Permanent Neutrality Act, has sacrificed all meaningful rights to maintain the security of the canal.

THE HIGH COST

While most Americans oppose giving the canal to Panama, they are literally livid at the prospect of paying Panama to take the facility off our hands. Thus, the economic arrangements will require special attention and some plausible justification must be provided to explain why, in the course of transferring this multibillion-dollar asset to Panama, we must at the same time provide for payment to Panama of upward of $50 million per year.

Of course, under the language of the treaty, the United States does not directly pay this money to the Panamanian Government, but the net result is the same. Under article XIII, dealing with the economic participation by the Republic of Panama, the agreement provides for Panama receiving $0.30 per ton for each vessel transiting the canal. Moreover, 5 years after the new treaty goes into effect, this figure will be adjusted upward each 2 years to reflect changes in the American wholesale price index.

Some have contended that this provision places a ceiling on the amounts that the tolls may rise for the next 22 years. But, more likely, the effect will be a rising floor for future toll increases. Coupled with the per ton figure, the United States also quadruples the annuity payment to Panama to $10 million and promises another $10 million if canal revenues exceed expenses. This last provision may seem to provide an incentive for the efficient operation of the canal, but more likely, this will simply encourage a rise in tolls that will permit the $10 million to be extracted.

All of this money derives from the revenues collected by the new Panama Canal Commission. The estimates of the total amount varies depending on the volume of cargo. But, on the basis of last year's volume of 117 million tons of cargo, this would have meant approximately $45 million, or about 20 times as much as Panama receives under the 1903 treaty. If the canal has its anticipated rise in traffic this coming year, but still runs a deficit, this figure would rise to over $50 million.

In order to compensate for this huge new expenditure by the operators of the canal, Ambassador Linowitz has already indicated that tolls will have to rise by 25 percent to 30 percent upon ratification of the treaty. This would represent the single largest increase in tolls since the Panama Canal began operations in 1914. This rise relates largely to compensation being provided the Panamanian Government. But, as indicated in the analysis above, probably larger incentives will have to be provided to skilled workers to remain in Panama under the new treaty.

Despite the fact that the revenues going into the Panamanian treasury derive from the general operation of the canal, the actual expense shall be borne by those ships that transit the canal and through them the producers and consumers of the goods shipped. This could have severe repercussion on some products, such as American agricultural goods being exported from the gulf coast to the Orient or oil flowing from Alaska to our gulf coast. Therefore, although though the payments to Panama are indirect, the American taxpayer will bear much of the burden of the increase which presumably will rise each year due to the indexing procedures.

Overall, this constitutes a radical alteration of the concept of the Panama Canal. While the United States has always viewed the canal as facilitating world commerce, the Panamanians clearly view the waterway as their own OPEC in miniature, their monopoly over travel from one ocean to the other. And, given the veto power they hold over the American right to negotiate building another canal, Panama can effectively stymie any prospective competition.

Having expended an estimated $7 billion over the past 74 years in order to bring into existence and operate the canal and all its related facilities, the American people have a right to ask why they must pay to have this enormous asset, run so efficiently and fairly for so long, taken off their hands by the Panamanian Government. This is particularly true when sales of only several million dollars to other nations in Latin America have been suspended due to criticisms of the nature of their government.

Yet, with respect to Panama, no concern surfaces over the nature of the military dictatorship in the country that the United States will in effect be rewarding with one of the largest gifts ever bestowed voluntarily upon another nation. If the Government of Panama appeared as a reliable friend of the United States, perhaps some justification for this enormous behest might be offered on foreign aid grounds. Instead, the Torrijos regime has constantly extolled Fidel Castro as a great Latin American leader and proceeded on its own social revolution that has substantially destroyed the Panamanian economy. In my judgment, if these treaties were to be ratified, the United States would be rewarding the wrong government, in the wrong place, at the wrong time, and in the wrong manner.

THE ADMINISTRATION EFFORT

Mr. President, in addition to my concerns about what these treaties represent and what they say, in closing, I would also like to express my concern about the manner by which they are being sold to the American public. Months ago Governor Reagan rightfully termed the whole affair a "medicine show". And, I can only accuse President Carter's chief political strategist, Hamilton Jordan, of understatement when he told the Baltimore Sun:

We are going to spend a tremendous amount of political capital to get the treaty ratified.

I have found one of the most intriguing developments resulting from the Panama Canal treaty issue to be the negative approach most proponents have adopted in their efforts "sell" the document to the American people. Actually, "intriguing" is not a graphic enough description of the sales effort being promoted. "Insulting", although harsh, is probably a much more accurate description of a campaign which is calculated to frighten people into accepting a bad agreement by attempting to persuade them that because the Canal is vulnerable to attack by elements within Panama, this facility can only be insulated from destruction through acceptance of the current treaty.

This "argument" is the most prominently mentioned of the reasons for relinquishing control of the waterway. According to this line of reasoning, since the canal is susceptible to attack, the Panamanian Government has raised the spectre of guerrilla warfare unless we deliver—either our country accepts the treaty negotiated and turns the canal over or it will be put out of commission with everyone losing in the process. Largely upon this basis, the canal treaty proponents are mounting what they refer to as an "educational" program to apprise Americans of the purported dangers.

In my opinion, of all the approaches those who favor ratification could have chosen to "educate" the people with, this is the least likely to succeed. It would not succeed because the American people will reject it. Treaty supporters have maneuvered themselves into the unenviable position of attempting to convince the American public that they should forego a valuable strategic asset because violent actions have been threatened if we do not knuckle under.

I, personally, do not believe that an "educational" program heavily resting on the foundation of the "violence argument", when there is ample evidence that the document itself is faulty, dangerous and inequitable, will have any chance of success. Possibly, this is the only really viable avenue of approach for treaty proponents because the treaty is so poor as to be indefensible on most other grounds.

Mr. President, the whole concept of a propaganda campaign is disturbing in our American context. Certainly, the administration has the right, indeed even the obligation, to take its case to the people. But, the vehemence of their propaganda effort must be a function of the recognition that they have an uphill battle, since the Panama Canal agreement certainly will not sell itself.

I personally deplore the pomp and grandeur that accompanied the signing of the treaties last year. This ploy was clearly designed to force the hand of the Senate into acceptance of a document without scrutiny. The administration hoped to reduce the Senate's vital advise and consent role to that of a mere rubber stamp.

What is far worse, however, in recent months the administration has begun to distort some of the fundamental facts regarding the Canal Zone—distortions which, if not corrected, will cause many Americans to reach wrong conclusions. I spoke earlier of the sovereignty question. As another example, notwithstanding President Carter to the contrary, the United States does not pay rent on the Canal Zone. Instead we pay an annuity of $2.3 million for use of the Panama Railroad franchise and the Rio Hato Air Base, which we built. There is no mention of rent or lease in the 1903 Treaty or its amendments.

These are crucial facts. And, I am afraid that their distortion could confuse the American people. Stating your case to the public is one thing, mistating it is another.

I regret to say that the whole affair smacks to me of arrogant elitism. Once again, the benevolent leaders of government, business and labor are purporting to prescribe to the masses policies against their wishes for their own "good."

There is almost a feeling of deja vu today as, one after the other, familiar names and faces of those who run our foreign policy in the 1960's reenter the scene to bless the Panama Canal treaty. I get the distinct impression they have once again found it comfortable returning to the arena where many programs they designed a decade ago are now being carried out. Yet, this is not particularly comforting since the era of "the best and the brightest" was not once renowned for its foreign policy successes.

It looks like big business is concerned enough about insuring its investments in Panama to back the treaty. It is no secret that the Torrijos regime is teetering close to the edge of financial collapse. What is less well known is that many U.S. companies have created offshore investment centers in Panama, taking advantage of Panama's lax banking and tax laws, and pouring literally hundreds of millions of dollars there.

If the walls caved in on the Torrijos government, American dollars heavily invested in the country would be lost. With this treaty and its extravagant payoff plans, the Panamanian economy would be pumped up and many American businessmen saved from a financial drubbing. Additionally, I think the business community has bought the "violence argument" and is willing to have taxpayer dollars bail them out of imagined Latin difficulties.

The third leg of the establishment triad offering support for the Panama Canal Treaty is the leadership of big labor. There is so much politics tied in with this endorsement that I am not sure the merits of the treaty were a consideration. The polls show that the rank and file members do not support the treaty. Perhaps not all the leadership does either, but I cannot tell due to the heavyhandedness of George Meany. Louis Fattorosi is strongly against the treaty. Last month he was scheduled to speak out against the treaties as a member of the Panama Truth Squad. However, he was warned by the AFL-CIO head office that if he did so the AFL-CIO would revoke the charters of the Canal Zone unions.

So, once again, we see a case of establishment arrogance. The power blocs in Washington have decided to "educate" the masses on the necessity of ratifying the Panama Canal Treaty. In fact, they have determined the issue to be so crucial that they justify hiding secrets, heavyhandedness, and distortions in order to ram the treaties down the throats of the American people.

Mr. President, I sincerely doubt that any propaganda campaign, no matter how skillfully handled, could "sell" this very dangerous and inequitable treaty to the American people. The fact that there is nothing really positive to commend it has led to a campaign based largely on simple scare tactics and distortions. Mr. President, Americans will not buy it. We have responsibilities which must be met now and in the future and such responsibilities will not be dismissed by threats of blackmail which carries with them undesirable precedents. I firmly believe that it will be impossible to "educate" our people to accept something that is wrong.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. LAXALT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHURCH. Is the Senator really maintaining that the United States has, in the past, claimed to be sovereign in the Canal Zone? I do not think that he will find that confirmed in any Supreme Court decision relating to the treaty of 1903. In fact, the treaty language itself does not claim sovereignty for the United States in the zone.

Mr. LAXALT. May I quote the language?

Mr. CHURCH. It says "as if sovereign."

Mr. LAXALT. May I quote the rest of the language?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, because the Supreme Court has passed on that language and never has a claim of sovereignty been made by the United States. Why have we been paying Panama fees all these years if we were sovereign there?

Mr. LAXALT. Royalties, payments on the air base. If there never has been sovereignty, that is another thing—

Mr. CHURCH. There have been payments. Not much, I concede, because $250,000 a year is not much for a zone that is 10 miles wide and 40 miles long. I would like to get property on those terms.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to read a provision of the treaty which I think is critical to this discussion?

Mr. CHURCH. I will, indeed. I simply want to make the point that, to my knowledge, the United States has never claimed sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

Mr. LAXALT. Whether or not we have, the treaty specifically provides for the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. LAXALT. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Aside from the language, did the distinguished Senator, when he left the Panama Canal, clear customs?

Mr. LAXALT. I do not recall.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The Senator does not recall? Certainly he recalls. He had to clear customs when he left.

Mr. LAXALT. I really do not recall. I was preoccupied with other matters.

Mr. HOLLINGS. It is nice to get preoccupied, but does the Senator know we treat the Canal Zone in our Treasury practices as a foreign country?

Mr. LAXALT. Yes.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Certainly we do. We treat it as sovereign Panama, and not U.S. territory. When the Senator goes to Alaska, he does not clear customs, or to Louisiana.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not recall paying any customs in the Canal Zone.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The customs regulations are clear. The Canal Zone is not in any way included in the sovereign customs territory of the United States.

Mr. LAXALT. Because that is our property, over which I think we like to have sovereignty.

If I declared, I did so out of the Republic of Panama, with no reference to the Canal Zone, which, in my judgment, is our property.

Mr. HOLLINGS. When we look at our postal statutes—I am sure the Senator is familiar with those?

Mr. LAXALT. Not as familiar as the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. As with customs, they are treated as a foreign territory. But look at the actual birthrights, because the Senator and I are both good constitutionalists. We know that under the Constitution and statutory laws of the United States of America, as in the Senator's State of Nevada, if a Panamanian couple came to Reno and had a child, that child born in Reno would be a citizen under the Constitution of the United States, because that is the sovereign United States out at Reno; is that not correct?

Mr. LAXALT. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLINGS. If we went down to the "sovereign" territory of the Canal Zone and that same Panamanian couple had that child in the zone, it would not be a citizen of the United States, would it?

Mr. LAXALT. That is true.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Well, the Senator has answered the question.

Mr. LAXALT. No.

Mr. HOLLINGS. How he treats it.

Mr. LAXALT. The premise of the Senator's argument is that these factors are conclusive. I go back to the wording of the original treaty, which specifically excludes and precludes any right of sovereignty on the part of the Panamanian Government in relation to the zone. If we do not have sovereignty, if Panama has no sovereignty, who does?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Panama has it, and the Senator knows good and well. Remember France and NATO. Charles deGaulle had the sovereignty, and we had the NATO Treaty, and he said, "Get out of France." We got out, did we not?

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator please explain to me then the express wording of the treaty to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama, any such sovereign rights, power and authority, is that not the clearest sort of disclaimer we would want?

Mr. HOLLINGS. The distinguished Senator, in answering that, just keeps going in his history. I am going to actual facts.

I know the distinguished Senator was an admirer of President Eisenhower and I fought under him as General Eisenhower.

In the 1950's under President Eisenhower, there was the Suez Canal crisis when Egypt took over the canal. In the Eisenhower administration's viewpoint, Egypt had sovereignty over the canal even though there were those same language rights concerning France and England. Where did the United States stand under President Eisenhower on the Suez Canal? And is that not where we stand on the zone?

Mr. LAXALT. I do not think so. I think the cases are clearly distinguishable.

May I ask leave, Mr. President, to permit Senator Helms to speak? He has been waiting patiently for a while. I am going to interrupt my particular presentation. He has exceedingly pressing engagement and wanted very much to be heard on this today.

If my colleagues will not object, I would like very much to have Senator Helms take the floor and make his presentation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Nevada for his courtesy to me.

I will say to him and to other Senators that it was made clear this morning that there would be opening statements today, and while I heard a number of statements which I consider to be erroneous and perhaps bordering on the absurd, I have not interrupted any of the proponents of the treaties, assuming that full debate would ensue at a later time on this floor.

I would say to the Senator from Nevada that it is undisputed that the United States does have sovereign rights in Panama, and we will get into that in some detail as this debate proceeds during the next few weeks.

But for the time being, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina wishes to address himself to the so-called Baker-Byrd amendment which has already been filed and which is at the desk.

Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) and the distinguished minority leader (Mr. Baker) have together sponsored amendments to the Neutrality Treaty which are designed to clarify and make more specific our rights and obligations under that treaty. Although I received an invitation to join as a cosponsor, I declined to do so, even though I appreciated their courtesy.

Mr. President, I do not disagree with the aims of the two leaders in proposing these changes. Indeed, I join with them in believing the American people are very doubtful about any Panama Treaty that does not clearly spell out our rights of defense of the canal. Like the two distinguished leaders, I believe that the treaty, as it stands, does not adequately define our defense rights.

Having said that, I must say that I differ with my two friends on the language they have offered to improve the treaty. In fact, as I look at their language, I fear it will unduly constrict the United States right to take unilateral action in defense of the canal. My reading of the language is that it makes the treaty worse, not better. It contains an inherent contradiction, requiring extensive, subtle argument to explain away.

Now, Mr. President, the contradiction is this, in amendment 20 the text states that each of two countries shall defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and, consequently, shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

But, Mr. President, and nothing has been said on this floor about that this afternoon, in the next paragraph it says that this shall not be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama, and that any U.S. action shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

Now, of course, such language would be satisfactory were the treaty proposing that we would retain our present status in the Canal Zone; but, of course, we would not.

So, from a practical standpoint, there is simply no way that we could conduct military operations in the defense of the canal without occupying at least some portions of Panamanian territory. If Panama should not concur in our action, or if Panama actively opposed it, there is no question in my mind that Panama would interpret such action as directed against her territorial integrity and her political independence.

The extent of the confusion is evidenced in the extent of the convolutions in the reasoning of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Indeed, I must congratulate the Committee on Foreign Relations on its ingenuity. The basic reasoning put forth there is that we would not offend Panama's territorial integrity or political independence because we would have no intention of permanently detaching Panamanian territory.

Unfortunately, that simply will not do. Although the argument is somewhat ingenious, it is not ingenuous.

Here is a right, one of the most fundamental of the rights necessary to preserve our interests, yet the language supposedly guaranteeing that right is so vague that it needs extensive explanation, interpretation, and ex parte pleading.

Will it now be necessary to get General Torrijos to agree that the committee's interpretation of the interpretation is the correct one? It seems to me that a Panamanian interpretation could be exactly the opposite.

The geography of the canal is such that to secure it adequately, we would have to secure the surrounding territory and, if Panama did not concur, we would have to do it anyway, or, allow the canal to be closed. Whether a "detaching" of territory would be "temporary" or whether it would be "permanent" would be a matter of interpretation.

Would we ever have to act against Panama's wishes? Every military expert who has testified on these treaties, including those strongly supporting them, has argued that the principal threat to the canal was from Panama. Whether this will change as a result of ratification of the treaties is a matter of conjecture—perhaps wishful thinking is more accurate. I think that any objective observer would agree that the odds are 50-50 or less.

Therefore, the only way in which the security of the canal can be assured is a treaty right that guarantees to the United States the clear right of unilateral action, no ifs, ands and buts.

Both the treaties and amendment 20 propose joint responsibilities; but all are silent upon whether the joint responsibility can also be exercised unilaterally. But only amendment 20 goes further than the treaties, and it specifically denies to the United States the right to take actions directed against territorial integrity of Panama.

Although we have other international treaty commitments that prohibit us from using force or the threat of force against other nations, the actual inclusion of such language in the context of supposed rights to take military action to defend the canal strongly undermines that right and it casts a cloud over any exercise of such rights.

Fortunately, however, Mr. President, there is an alternative. Former Deputy Defense Secretary William Clemens testified before the Armed Services Committee that, as a representative of the National Security Council, he, himself, had negotiated a security clause that had been approved by the Defense Department, and by the State Department; and I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that General Torrijos, himself, approved it.

It clearly and unambiguously spells out the right of unilateral action in the context of all other international treaty obligations. The language is as follows:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the two Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for neutrality and security of the Canal through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each Party shall take other diplomatic, economic, or military measures as such Party deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes.

Mr. President, this language says that each party shall take military measures as such party deems necessary. This phrase absolutely leaves the decision to the United States. There is no ambiguity about it being a concurrent decision; and, in my judgment, it would be a great improvement over amendment 20.

Therefore, I intend to submit this language as a substitute, as a means of perfecting the language offered by the two distinguished leaders of the Senate. It is not offered in opposition to their language and intentions but to support their intentions and to effect their purpose more accurately.

I understand the difficulty that faces both leaders. The Clements language was not made public until both leaders—the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) and the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Baker)—had announced their intentions; but, fortunately, the Armed Services Committee hearings did reveal this alternative in time for the Senate to act.

I believe that anyone who is a supporter of amendment 20 also could be a supporter of this substitute.

As former Deputy Secretary Clements has testified, even General Torrijos agreed to this language, so there should be no difficulty from that quarter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my proposed amendment be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment insert the following:

"In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the two Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for neutrality and security of the Canal through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each Party shall take such other diplomatic, economic, or military measures as such Party deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes."

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as we enter this historic debate, I would like to call attention to the hearings of the Senate Armed Services Committee, to which I alluded earlier, and to urge all my colleagues to peruse them carefully. As many are doubtless aware, these hearings were held on January 24 and 31, and February 1. For some reason, the news media saw fit to ignore those hearings for the most part. Except for coverage of the February 1 hearing by the Washington Star, little attention was paid to some of the extraordinary testimony that was developed at those hearings.

Because of the volume of material relating to the Panama Canal, and the haste with which consideration of the treaties was brought to the floor, special burdens have been imposed on Senators in their attempt to give judicious scrutiny to the issue. Although the treaties were signed on September 7, the 354-page report of the Foreign Relations Committee was not available Friday as hoped. I am informed that a few copies were available on Saturday, when the Senate was not in session. For all practical purposes, it was not available until Monday, when the Senator from North Carolina, returning from a meeting with the Governor of his State, was stranded in the worst blizzard to hit the east coast in 40 years, along with thousands of fellow citizens. While I am delighted to begin debate on an issue vital to the American people, let the record show the circumstances in which the debate has begun.

Similarly, the armed services hearings are available just today, about noon time. The committee staff is to be congratulated for the speed and diligence with which the hearings were edited and printed. Let the record show that this was accomplished in only 4 working days. Needless to say, the other Members of the Senate have hardly had time to become acquainted with their contents.

Coming at the end of a long period of public deliberation and discussion, the hearings of the committee, although brief, indisputably established two points:

First, the decision to give away the Panama Canal was based upon purely political pressures in total disregard of the defense and economic consequences of that decision;

Second, the outward rationale of the political decision is demonstrably false. Whether there was a hidden rationale, undisclosed to the public or to the Senate, was beyond the scope of the hearings conducted by the Armed Services Committee.

The hearings were notable for the quality of the testimony and the integrity of the witnesses, most of whom hold high offices under the U.S. Constitution, or did hold them in the past, and participated in historic events. Thus, in a very short space of time, the committee was able to amass an important set of facts, hitherto undisclosed, which deserves to have a profound influence as the Senate works its will on these treaties.

The questioning of expert military witnesses, both those who favor the treaties and those who oppose them, revealed that the Panama Canal still plays a vital role as a catalyst in our defense planning, and that role is placed in jeopardy by the treaties, especially the lack of authority for unilateral military decision and the requirement that our military forces leave after the year 2000. The economic aspects of the treaties are still in total disarray, with little agreement on future projections, except that it is going to cost the American taxpayer untold billions in appropriated funds. Indeed, certain fundamental economic issues yet remain to be negotiated. Let us take up each aspect in turn.

THE MILITARY VALUE OF THE CANAL

The testimony of both Admiral Holloway and Admiral Moorer was significant for understanding the military value of the canal. Admiral Moorer summed it up in one sentence:

In fact, there is no feasible war plan for the United States, taking into account our reduced forces and extended commitments, that does not assume that the Panama Canal will be available for full time priority use.

Admiral Holloway's testimony pointed out that denial of the canal to the United States would require additional naval forces to fulfill our defense mission, and those forces would have to circumnavigate South America, a trip that would add 3 to 3½ weeks and 8,000 miles to the transit. He pointed out that this redeployment would greatly multiply the area of ocean that the U.S. Navy would have to make secure, and we could expect severe losses without a proportionate increase in antisubmarine warfare forces. Indeed, he said:

It would be extremely difficult to detect a shift in Soviet submarine operating areas from the north and middle Atlantic sea lines of communication to those around the tip of South America.

The testimony of both admirals deserves to be studied in detail. It is noteworthy that the testimony of both corroborates the findings of a study which was prepared at my request by a civilian analyst at the Library of Congress, Mr. Edmund J. Gannon. Mr. Gannon's study is available from my office.

DEFENSE BEFORE THE YEAR 2000

Under the treaties, the United States has the major responsibility for defense of the canal, without the specific authority to take unilateral action to defend the canal, even if the threat comes from Panama or from individual Panamanians. Although treaty proponents argue that the authority is implied, their arguments are devastated by the Carter-Torrijos understanding, which specifically forbids the United States to intervene in Panamanian internal affairs or to violate Panama's territorial integrity. Although clearly the United States has no wish to do either for its own sake, it is clear that the extension of Panamanian sovereignty over the canal operating areas makes it impossible to defend the canal without, at least secondarily, impinging on both.

The testimony of former Deputy Secretary of Defense William P. Clements, Jr., was extraordinary on this point. The entire controversy about the treaty's alleged provisions for intervention was directly refuted by Mr. Clements' revelation that the former administration had obtained consent for a security clause that clearly provided for unilateral intervention. It was on this basis that Mr. Clements had formerly been an enthusiastic advocate of new treaties; yet the final treaty drafts eliminated this clause completely.

Mr. Clements provided valuable historical testimony about the events which led to the reopening of full-scale negotiations in 1975. Mr. Clements himself was deputized by the National Security Council to solve the security problem, and flew to Panama to negotiate the issue with General Torrijos. The clause was drafted in the Department of Defense, approved by the Department of State and the National Security Council—and even approved by General Torrijos himself, as Mr. Clements affirmed in response to close questioning. The language was as follows:

In the event of any threat to the neutrality or security of the Canal, the Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the Canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each Party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes. (Emphasis added.)

At the present time the United States enjoys the rights of a sovereign in the Canal Zone, so it is not necessary even to consult to defend our own property. The Clements language is a step down from the rights we now enjoy; but it is a marvel of precision and definition when compared to ambiguity of the defense clauses, both denumerated article IV, in each of the treaties. The Clements language unambiguously gives the United States the unilateral authority for defense actions, even without the approval of Panama.

It is incredible that any negotiating team, with the best interests of the Nation at heart, would backdown from such a clause once it had been established. It is a defect that drives straight at the heart of the treaties and makes them unacceptable in any form. There are, of course, other great defects which vitiate the realistic value of the treaties; but the lack of clear-cut defense rights is the root cause of the numbing distrust of the treaties which has gripped the American people.

DEFENSE AFTER THE YEAR 2000

Another key issue is the defense of the canal after the year 2000. The treaty provides that only the Republic of Panama may maintain military forces in Panama after the year 2000, even though the United States and Panama agree to "maintain the regime of neutrality."

The military problem is that once U.S. forces have pulled out of Panama, it would be extremely costly both in terms of manpower, materiel, and money to attempt to reassert our presence in order to maintain neutrality in the canal's operation. If Panama resisted such an attempt, it would be even more difficult to keep the canal operational, since the canal would be then totally Panamanian in personnel and administration.

It is significant that Admiral Holloway, even though he had agreed to support the treaties because of their political implications, freely conceded that his military judgment was that the defense problem would be enormously complicated by withdrawal. Indeed, he revealed that he had strongly argued for a U.S. military presence, even if only in a limited form, after the year 2000. Without such a presence, it would be necessary to retake the airfields, or to land a marine amphibious force in the canal area. Every military man knows that such requirements are detrimental to defense needs.

Moreover, both Admiral Moorer and Admiral Holloway pointed out that the present Canal Zone serves as a base of naval and air operations 3,000 miles south of the United States. Admiral Moorer also drew attention to the fact that a modern navy depends upon ample stocks of petroleum products at strategic geographical intervals. He said that such stocks are not always available from commercial sources, particularly when such stocks are sensitive to political upheavals, such as the OPEC oil embargo. In the Pacific, the Canal Zone is the only U.S. refueling center south of California.

SUPPORT OF LATIN AMERICAN NATIONS

The major foreign policy rationale advanced for the ratification of the treaties is the argument that the Latin American nations eagerly support the withdrawal of the United States from the Canal Zone. Admiral Holloway testified that this was a consideration which tipped the balance for him in favor of the treaties, overriding his military judgment.

Yet upon close questioning, Admiral Holloway admitted that he had never personally conversed with the head of any Latin American state, and therefore, had no firsthand knowledge of their views. Instead, he relied upon State Department briefings for the information which apparently outweighed his years of considerable military expertise.

This attitude contrasted strongly with the views of another distinguished military officer on active duty, Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Jr., Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board. It is significant that General Sumner did not appear by choice, but appeared only at the express invitation of the committee, confirmed by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

General Sumner is both an outstanding military analyst, and, by profession, an expert on Latin America. The Inter-American Defense Board is an independent international organization established by the Rio Treaty. In his capacity as Chairman, General Sumner represents the views of no single nation, but of all 19 members.

General Sumner testified he travels constantly in Latin America, and meets frequently with the heads of state of all members of the Board, as well as with their high-level defense officers. He testified that he had discussed the Panama Canal with all of them; and that 17 of reliable east-west land transportation, the 19 members—United States and Panama excluded—expressed very grave concern about the treaties. He said that they were very disturbed about the economic consequences of the treaties, because of the fragile economies which many of them have. Since South America has no reliable east-west land transportation, the Panama Canal assumes a far greater importance to them.

General Sumner said that some of the Latin American countries were in favor of the treaties at first, but when they received copies of the treaties they became worried about their economic prospects. He said:

When they looked at what this was going to cost them, they had very serious reservations. Almost without exception they have expressed their opinion that the way the United States has operated the Canal over the past decades has been fair and equitable.

MULTILATERAL VERSUS BILATERAL APPROACH

General Sumner also pointed out that the other Latin American nations had been ignored in attempting to solve the Panama Canal problem—even though the canal is so important to them that it should be called "The Canal of the Americas." He suggested that in times past when the bilateral approach to international plans had failed, that it was sometimes helpful to call in all parties with a direct interest to find a mutual solution. Pointing out that the Inter-American Defense Board already had a structure to work together on the common defense of the hemisphere, he agreed to sound out members of the Board as to constructive solutions to the canal problem.

General Sumner's testimony points up the deep flaw in the argument that the giveaway of the Panama Canal will usher in a new era of good feeling in Latin America. On the contrary, just the opposite is likely to happen. The giveaway of the canal to a small and unstable nation is likely to inspire distrust, or at best indifference. Moreover, it is incongruous to pretend that the way to establish closer ties to Latin America is to ignore the direct interests of these nations in the canal for 14 years, to consult with no one, and then to hand the canal over lock, stock, and barrel to one nation whose political institutions inspire confidence in no one and which is allied in a show of friendship with the one Latin American pariah nation, Communist Cuba. Insulting and demeaning diplomacy never makes friends.

COSTS OF MILITARY RELOCATION

There is not the opportunity here to go into the additional military costs which would be imposed upon the taxpayers of the United States if the canal were closed to the U.S. naval fleet. Ship construction, relocation of communications and intelligence facilities, and higher costs of resupply would all have to be considered; but it is difficult to speculate on the future designs of potential enemies.

However, the committee received good estimates of the costs for the relocation of present U.S. military facilities in the Canal Zone.

A number of these facilities will be turned over to the Panamanian National Guard as soon as the treaty goes into effect, and brand-new consolidated facilities will have to be constructed at other sites for the use of U.S. forces. This construction is totally unnecessary, except for the implementation agreements adopted pursuant to the treaties. Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe, U.S. Army, testified that this construction would cost the taxpayers $42.9 million. All the new facilities will be turned over to Panama by the year 2000.

ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF THE TREATIES

The economic aspects of the treaties reflect the chaos and disarray of the negotiating process. It is difficult, even at this date, to assess the economic impact of the treaties. The facts simply are not available. Consider the following problems:

A study by American Management Systems, consultant to the committee, concludes that the two major systems of methodology for protecting traffic and revenues are inadequate and based upon guesswork, resulting in wide disparities in the extant professional projections.

A study commissioned by the Department of State and the Panama Canal Company by International Research Associates—a study which was supposed to be definitive—was strongly criticized by the president of the Panama Canal Company for being overly optimistic on its projections of revenues from North Slope oil. The study is not yet available to Congress.

The implementing legislation establishing the structure of the Panama Canal Commission, its accounting practices, and the range of labor benefits was promised for last October, but is still being withheld from Congress.

Basic financial issues yet remain to be negotiated with Panama—issues involving millions of dollars annually—and Governor Parfitt and other witnesses testified that the United States and Panamanian positions stand at opposite poles.

Millions of dollars of costs associated with implementation of the treaties do not appear in the Panama Canal Company budget or the projected Commission budgets because these costs will be transferred to other accounts as yet unselected—for example educational facilities may be transferred to the Department of Defense budget, and then again they may not.

Panama Canal Company projections are based upon unrealistic inflation assumption—for example 5 per annum, as against actual 6.7 percent today—and upon the forgoing of interest to the U.S. Treasury and of agreed-upon payments to Panama out of “surplus.”

The Comptroller General of the United States estimated that deficits the first year could range from $37 million to $79 million, depending upon which set of assumptions as to accounting practices is used.

The Panama Canal Commission will lose 58 percent of the land available to the present company for operating the canal, 43 percent of its present U.S. employees, 52 percent of its present Panamanian employees, and 69 percent of its nontoll revenues—35.6 percent of all revenues. Although some of these employees may transfer to other United States or Panamanian entities, there is considerable doubt that present pay rates and job benefits will be preserved.

There is agreement on one thing, however; the American taxpayers will be paying billions of dollars in appropriated funds for the luxury of giving the canal to Panama. Although the language of the treaties suggests that payments will be paid to Panama out of tolls and other income by the Panama Canal Commission, the fact is that the Commission ought to be a U.S. Government corporation, if legal precedent is followed. As such, the Commission can pay no revenues to Panama; they will be paid into the U.S. Treasury—as the Panama Canal Company does at present—where they become funds belonging to the U.S. taxpayer.

According to the U.S. Constitution, no money shall be drawn from the U.S. Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Payments to Panama must therefore be appropriated by Congress every year by law. Although the appropriations doubtless will be established according to the treaty arrangements, the funds still represent funds which could have accrued to the benefit of U.S. taxpayers.

Moreover, extraordinary expenses of the Commission—removal of major slides, damage caused by war, and so forth—will still be the responsibility of the U.S. Government. Governor Parfitt also testified that any debts or liens remaining to the Commission by the year 2000 would have to be made up by the United States. The reality of that liability hinges upon the interpretation of an ambiguous section of the treaty, the clause promising contingent payments to Panama out of surplus earnings. Problems involve the following:

Whether or not the toll base should include the $10 million "surplus"; that is, should tolls be set high enough to produce a surplus?

Whether or not the treaty obligation to roll over the contingent obligation to the next year that a surplus is earned ends in the year 2000; that is, if no contingent fees are paid for 22 years, do we owe Panama $220 million in the year 2000?

Whether or not the Commission should pay interest to the U.S. Treasury on the U.S. investment; for example, is the projected amount of interest of approximately $20 million each year to be a donation by the U.S. taxpayers to the Commission's operation? The total is a minimum of $440 million over 22 years, yet the Panama Canal Company's projection of only a 19.5-percent initial toll increase is based upon forgoing the interest payment.

Whether or not the entire U.S. investment should be recouped through accelerated depreciation by the year 2000; for example, should the taxpayers make an additional gift to Panama of facilities with a current book value of $618 million, but a replacement value of $4.6 billion? Comptroller General Staats testified that recovery of the U.S. investment would require another $23 million per year to recover the book value.

OTHER HIDDEN COSTS

In addition to the above unresolved problems, there are hidden costs as well. These include:

The $8.9 million that the Republic of Panama has refused to pay for services rendered by the Panama Canal Company, some of the debt going back as far as 1955.

Early retirement costs to be charged to the Civil Service Commission of some $7.5 million a year for 22 years, that is, $165 million total.

Costs of benefits for dependents of certain personnel transferred to DOD—mainly schooling—$5 million annually for 22 years, that is, $110 million total.

Complete inventory of all assets of the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone Government, $2 million—the last inventory was in 1950–51 and cost $750,000.

Indirect subsidy to Panama of $6.6 million a year for at least 3 years, totaling $19.8 million, through the annual payment of $10 million for “services.” Many of these services—for example fire—will be duplicated by the Commission to insure reliability; but even so it is estimated, that Panama, with its lower wage base, will provide the services at a cost of $4.4 million per year. After 3 years, the treaty provides that the payments will be adjusted on the basis of actual costs, but no definition of actual costs is provided.

SUMMARY OF UNEXPECTED COSTS

It is not certain by any means that all of the unexpected costs of the Panama Canal treaties have yet been discovered. Those discussed above, however, may be summarized as follows:

Military base relocation.....	$42,900,000
Foregoing of interests due to U.S. Treasury: $20 mil. p.a. × years	440,000,000
Foregoing of depreciation to recoup U.S. investment: $20 mil. p.a. × 22 years	440,000,000
Panamanian interpretation or amount due under article III (IV) (c) in the year 2000 if no “surplus” is produced during preceding 22 years	220,000,000
Arrears of Republic of Panama for services rendered by Panama Canal Company since 1955	8,900,000
Subsidy to Panama for fire, police protection over Panamanian costs: $6.6 mil. p.a. for at least 3 years	19,800,000
Early retirement costs charged to U.S. Civil Service Commission: $7.5 mil. p.a. × 22 years	165,000,000
Benefits for dependents of certain personnel transferred D.o.D.: $5 mil. p.a. × 22 years	110,000,000
Cost of taking complete inventory	2,000,000
Total unexpected costs	1,448,600,000
Estimated annual tonnage fees due to Panama: $50 mil. p.a. × 22 years	1,100,000,000
Annual fixed fee: $10 mil. p.a. × 22 years	220,000,000
Total of expected treaty payments.....	1,320,000,000
Grand total	2,768,600,000

All costs are expressed in constant dollars without inflation factors or treaty provided upward revisions included.

THE HASTY TREATY

The committee hearings did not touch upon the grave constitutional issues, such as the role of Congress in the disposal of U.S. territory and property under article IV, section 3; or the role of the House in the appropriation process under article I, section 7. Nor did the committee hearings touch upon the important issue of national sovereignty and the national will. But within their true scope, they revealed that the negotiators completely bypassed the practical issues of military defense and economic stability in their search for a pseudo-political solution to a nonproblem.

Perhaps a small clue to the tenor of the negotiations which produced these treaties may be found in the testimony of Governor Parfitt when he was asked if Ambassador Sol Linowitz had ever consulted him directly about the operational problems. The Governor testified that the Ambassador had not; and in fact, to the Governor's knowledge, the Ambassador had never even come into the Canal Zone.

Mr. President, I hope that at later stages of the debate on the treaties we will have a substantial number of Senators here. I count about six in the Chamber at this moment, including the distinguished Presiding Officer, which means that the statements by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and others will pass like a ship in the night.

I commend the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader, who suggested this morning that Senators stay on the floor and participate in the debate and hear the opposing views, so that they will have some understanding of what is at stake in this matter.

If Senators do not do that, if they voted a mishmash, then this Nation will suffer.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Nevada for yielding to me, and I thank the distinguished occupant of the Chair.

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes).

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Nevada, because we deal in part with the issue of sovereignty and did not have the opportunity to fully complete it, certain excerpts of the report dealing with this subject be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

(2) SOVEREIGNTY

Much confusion has surrounded the illusive concept of sovereignty and the issue of what sovereign interests the United States possesses in the Canal Zone. Whatever the term implies, and whatever such interests the United States holds, it seems clear that the phrase "territory" * * * belonging to the United States" subsumes land over which the United States exercises sovereign power, and that the disposal-of-property clause, discussed above, empowers the United States to transfer sovereignty as well as common law property rights. The Committee does not therefore believe that the issue of sovereignty—as a strictly legal matter—is relevant to the Canal debate. The United States can legally transfer its interests; the question is whether as a matter of policy it should.

To whatever extent it is relevant, it appears that the United States does not possess sovereignty over the Canal Zone. "Sovereignty," broadly defined, is the ultimate power to exercise governmental functions within a particular territory. The Committee believes, based on the terms of the 1903 and 1936 treaties with Panama and court decisions, that Panama has always maintained titular sovereignty over that territory. The United States has held certain rights to exercise certain attributes of sovereignty, but those rights are distinguishable from the underlying sovereign interest of Panama over the Canal Zone.

Article III of the 1903 Treaty with Panama provides that the United States has " . . . all the rights, power and authority within the Zone . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power of authority."

In this testimony before the Committee on September 26, 1977, Ambassador Linowitz, referring to Article III of the 1903 Treaty, noted that "If we had sovereignty we would not have needed the words that we have certain rights . . . to act as if it were the sovereign." As Ambassador Bunker put it, "We have had rights, but not sovereignty."

Article III of the 1936 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Panama states that the Canal Zone is "the territory of the Republic of Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States."

One oft-quoted case, cited for the proposition that the United States has somehow acquired sovereign rights, is Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24 (1907). In that case, the Court said that—

" . . . it is hyper-critical to contend the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this nation, because of omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real property."

The real question in Wilson, however, was not which nation possessed sovereignty but rather whether the United States had sufficient interest and authority in the Zone to expend funds for the construction of the Canal. The Supreme Court found that the grant of authority in the 1903 Treaty was sufficient. The limits of the Court's holding were pointed out by the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone that same year in Canal Zone v. Coulson, 1 Canal Zone Supreme Court Reports 50 (1907) in which the defendant contended that the Court in Wilson had held that the Canal Zone was the territory of the United States and that, therefore, the Constitution applied in the Zone. The court rejected this contention and stated as follows:

"The Supreme Court did not hold more in that case [Wilson] than that the United States had the use, occupation and control in perpetuity of the Canal Zone. It is apparent from an examination of the treaty that the United States is not the owner in fee of the Canal Zone, but has the use, occupation and control of the same in perpetuity so long as they comply with the terms of the treaty. . . ."

The Court went on to conclude that the rights of the United States in the Canal Zone were not such as to render the Constitution applicable.

In Vermilya-Brown Co. Inc. v. Connel, 335 U.S. 377 (1943), the Supreme Court was called upon to determine the status of certain United States military bases in Bermuda. The Court compared these bases to the Canal Zone, which the Court said was "admittedly territory over which we do not have sovereignty." The Court found that the ability of Congress to legislate depended not upon sovereignty, but upon control.

A variety of the other indices of sovereignty suggest that sovereignty over the Zone lies in the Government of Panama. In contrast to the sovereignty acquired by the United States through the purchases of the Louisiana Territory or Alaska, the United States did not acquire sovereignty; it acquired, under the 1903 Treaty, the use, occupation and control of the Canal Zone. This is made even more clear by the fact that the United States has made annual payments for privileges acquired in the Canal Zone—as contrasted with territories over which this country acquired full sovereign interest. Principles of "citizenship by birth" are not applicable in the Canal Zone; a person born in the Canal Zone to parents who are not citizens of the United States would not be a U.S. citizen, as that person would be were he born in the United States, the Virgin Islands, Guam, or some other United States possession or territory. In addition, the Canal Zone is not listed by the Department of State as a territory or dependency in reports by the United States to the United Nations. Finally, the United States has allowed Panama to display its flag within the Zone, to collect income taxes within the Zone, and to exercise customs and immigration functions within the Zone.

For all these reasons, therefore, the Committee agrees with the Attorney General that "the Republic of Panama retained titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone"—although as noted above it does not regard that fact as a matter of legal consequence.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I now wish to yield the floor to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas (Senator Dole).

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield for just a few short remarks?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch).

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah, yes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I was particularly interested in the remarks and questions of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Senator Hollings), on this question of sovereignty.

To be frank with you, he asked a couple of questions such as, as to a national, a non-American person who has a child in Panama, will that child become a U.S. citizen? The answer to that is, "No."

Also, the fact that you might have to go through Customs when you go through Panama, which generally includes the country of Panama.

He said these are two indications that we do not have sovereignty in spite of the explicit language within the treaty itself which says that we do.

I would just like to remind my distinguished colleague and friend from South Carolina that citizenship has nothing to do with sovereignty, because Congress is what sets sovereignty under the Constitution.

I might mention that sovereignty has never conferred citizenship nor does it under the Constitution. Only Congress confers citizenship.

One of the most important cases in recent years is United States against Husband. The holding of that case was that the Panama Canal Zone is unincorporated American territory over which basically we have sovereignty.

The 1907 case of Wilson versus Shaw, which is a Supreme Court case, made it clear that basically we have sovereignty, because the question in that case was, does the United States have title enough to justify the expenditure of American funds in Panama, and the answer to that was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and never refuted, yes, we do.

So, I might add, the interesting question as propounded by my distinguished friend and colleague hardly disturbs the question of sovereignty under the Constitution or under any aspect or interpretation of the Constitution. The fact is, Senator Laxalt is absolutely right, the treaties make it abundantly clear that we have sovereignty, that Panama has waived all rights to sovereignty, and that it is lodged in us.

Mr. LAXALT. Since the Senator from Utah has demonstrated his expertise in the sovereignty and legal aspects of this treaty, for the purpose of the record will he indicate what in his opinion is the effect of the disclaimer of sovereignty in the Panamanians under the terms of the treaty.

Mr. HATCH. The effect is that they have turned over all rights and interest to the United States.

There was another misconception cited by our distinguished friend and colleague from Idaho, Senator Church. He indicated we are paying an $250,000 lease payment, or $250,000 payment for the use of the Panamanian land. That just is not true. That payment was paid pursuant to the waiver of Panama's rights to the Panamanian Railroad.

They released all rights to us in that railroad, and we have made that payment ever since—which now amounts to $2.328 million—every year since, in payment of the waiver of those rights.

We paid $10 million for the Panamanian territory that we now have as unincorporated U.S. territory, which, if it were increased to present worth from the 1914 price, actually the 1903 price, it would be worth about $120 million today in today's dollars.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield on this point?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I am happy to yield back to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator indulge me one moment?

Mr. DOLE. One moment. The Senator from Kansas would like to make his statement. I did not want to interfere with the orderly debate. We are going to have several weeks to do it.

I am happy to yield briefly.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to go directly to an assertion that was made that the $250,000 payment commitment contained in the 1903 treaty was directed to the railroad only, Article XIV of the 1903 treaty says:

As the price or compensation for the rights, powers and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

The provisions of this Article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

But no delay or difference of opinion under this Article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

So, I think the 1903 treaty is very clear, that that payment is for the rights, powers, and privileges and, of course, refers back in part to article III, which deals with this question of the grant made by Panama to the United States of certain powers that we can exercise as if we were sovereign.

Mr. HATCH. I have mentioned that all historical precedents that I have read and that all of the record indicates that the payment was strictly for release of rights with regard to the Panamanian Railroad. I do not think our article XIV changes that nor the Senator's interpretation of it.

I am happy to yield back to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. LAXALT. No; I yield the floor to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas, Senator Dole, is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that I think this is probably one of the most important foreign policy questions yet to come before the 95th Congress, and perhaps it is the most critical foreign policy issue of this decade.

The Senator from Kansas does not know how many votes there are for the treaties and how many votes are against. In my judgment, it is too close to call at this point.

Perhaps during this debate some will change their minds and some will change their positions. That is the way it should be.

It can be a very instructive and a very constructive debate. certainly the Senator From Kansas wishes to be part of that effort.

I would hope we do not fall into the trap of trying to bring up the treaties in reverse order, as is now being suggested by the Senate leadership, because it seems to this Senator we first must debate whether or not there is going to be a Panama Canal Treaty before we decide the second half of the agenda.

So I would suggest that the orderly procedure would be to take up the treaties as they were went to the Senate by the President, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama pointed out this morning.

There is no doubt in the mind of his Senator that there is a great deal of interest in both of these treaties.

TREATY DISCUSSIONS

Last Friday, the President asked me to step into his office, and we discussed the treaties. On Sunday, President Ford, called me long distance and we discussed the treaties. On Monday, Ambassador Strauss called me, and we discussed the treaties. On Tuesday, former Vice President Rockefeller called me, and we discussed the treaties. On Wednesday, today, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger called me, and we discussed the treaties.

I think it is common knowlege that they are all of one view, that they support the teaties. I had a very fine visit with each of these distinguished Americans and certainly I do not quarrel with their view.

I do not have the same feelings on sovereignty as some in the Senate. My concern is, are these the best treaties? Are that good treaties? Good for Panama, yes, but are they good for us, America?

I guess everyone here has had a very difficult time deciding just what to do, and how to posture himself, and how to vote, because there are political implications to the votes on these treaties.

Let me say that when the Senator from Kansas heard that our negotiators had reached an agreement last August 10, I resolved, as I assume every other Member resolved, to try to come to grips with the real issues in a conscientious and impartial frame of mind.

I di' not have any preconceived notions. I did not yet know all the details about the treaties.

I might add I had gone through the entire campaign as President Ford's running mate in 1976, and as far as I can recall was never asked about the Panama Canal treaties, even though they were the big issue between President Ford and Governor Reagan in securing the Republican Presidential nomination.

As far as I know, I was never asked by anyone from August 19 through the election what my views on the treaties would be. So I had no preconceived notions or any partisan commitments on the issue.

Some of us were asked to support the treaties before they were ever made public; but until the treaties were made public and released on September 7, like most other Senators, this Senator withheld his judgment.

Once they became available for inspection, it was our obligation as Senators to study the treaties, to adopt what we thought might be the best course. I knew of the political significance, and so I discussed it with many people in my State of Kansas. Many I did not have to discuss it with; they sent letter after letter, by the hundreds and by the thousands.

In December, I went to Panama with the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt). We had a visit with Omar Torrijos, the leader of Panama. We discussed the canal, and aspects of the canal treaties, with Canal Zone employees and military officers. I have also discussed them with State and local public officials, and other concerned citizens throughout the Nation in the past several months. I state that, so that those who might be interested will know that the process of reaching a decision is very difficult.

The objective approach of the Senator from Kansas toward this critical issue has been consistent. There were a number of unresolved points, as I read the proposed treaties. I recognize that the present 1903 Treaty is out of date in many respects. There is room for revision, but only in a responsible manner and to a practical degree.

So now we have the treaties before us, before the Senate of the United States, and it is our obligation as Senators to advise and consent, to give our best judgment, based not on partisan considerations but on what may be best for America and for Panama.

THESE TREATIES UNACCEPTABLE

I think all the arguments we will hear on this floor, whether they are for the treaties or against the treaties, would boil down to whether or not these are good treaties in the sense that they fully protect U.S. rights and interests. And are they the best treaties? Why not insist upon the best treaties that we can negotiate? Maybe they are the best. Maybe, after weeks and weeks of debate, the majority will determine that these are the best treaties.

I think, in the end, the ultimate question will be this: Would American interests be best served by Senate ratification, by a series of amendments, or by outright rejection of the treaties?

There is no doubt about it, the majority of Americans are still opposed to the treaties. The latest Gallup poll indicated it was very close, and that there may be a margin for these treaties if certain amendments were adopted.

However, I could not vote for the treaties as they were transmitted to the Senate. I do think a case can be made for updating the 1903 Panama Canal Treaty in a way that fully protects our rights as a nation, as well as the rights of Panama. I know that many opponents of these particular treaties, including Governor Reagan and others, have indicated they would be agreeable to some revisions in the traditional Panama Canal agreements. Like them I do not reject out of hand the concept of a new bilateral treaty.

Frankly, though, I am disappointed with most of the decisions rendered by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with regard to modification proposals set forth by this Senator and others. With the exception of the one amendment recommended by the committee, and originally proposed by this Senator last October, the committee rejected all other treaty amendment proposals. The committee's action leaves most of the basic concerns about these treaties unresolved. I know that I cannot support the treaties in the form recommended by the majority of the committee members, and I will actively oppose final ratification of the treaties in that form. And those are the crucial words: "in that form."

Regrettably, many of my Senate colleagues, like administration spokesmen, seem more preoccupied with avoiding treaty renegotiations or a second Panamanian plebiscite than with correcting treaty defects. Treaty modifications, they suggest, spell disaster both for these treaties and for the foreign policy stature of this administration.

THE CASE FOR AMENDMENTS

I reject the suggestion that Senate amendments to these treaties would be equated with defeat of the treaties. Neither do I accept the view that treaty amendments would be a crushing blow to the President's ability to conduct our foreign policy in the months ahead. Instead, I think the enactment by this body of any other amendments ought to be viewed in its proper light: As a new stage in canal treaty negotiations. As the Senate performs its constitutionally designated advisory role to the President in this international treatymaking process, further talks with the Panamanians on critical points may be necessary and should be welcomed.

But let us not overdramatize the consequences. Amendment of the canal treaties will not spell disaster for this administration's foreign policy program, and it should not, for it is not accomplished in a narrow partisan sense, or as a vote of "no confidence" for the President.

If we do our work as we should do our work, and as I think every Member of this body will do his work, it will be viewed by most thinking Americans as a conscientious effort by this body to preserve what we see as nonnegotiable interests.

I have listened to the arguments by treaty proponents that Panama will not accept changes in these treaties. But let me pose this question: Do my colleagues truthfully believe that Panama will reject out-of-hand a treaty that was 13 years in the making, simply because we suggest a few changes? Do my colleagues suggest that the Torrijos government will turn its back on the one thing that promises to insure that regime's popularity and power for years to come?

From a practical standpoint, Panama's leaders are not likely to reject these treaties simply because we insist on a few alterations. No, I think they will find it in their interest to "keep talking" at the negotiating table, as General Torrijos himself indicated to me during my visit to Panama last December.

As I recall General Torrijos' statement, he said he did not want a year-around plebescite, that another plebescite would be fine but he did not want a year-around plebescite.

So I suggest that whatever the action we take in the Senate, that Senate action will simply amount to a new stage in the treaty negotiations. And this Senator, for one, would be willing to see negotiations resume and continue for a few more months if it meant protecting America's vital defense and economic interests. Realistically, I think that is an arrangement that both governments can live with.

PRECEDENTS FOR TREATY MODIFICATION

All of us recognize, of course, that the U.S. Constitution gives the Senate the express responsibility to "advise and consent" on international treaty proposals, and there is ample precedent for our amending treaties such as this one. During the course of this Nation's history, more than 70 U.S. treaties with other nations have gone into force with Senate amendments attached. I believe it is our solemn duty and responsibility, as guarantors of the public trust, to modify treaties when necessary.

Least of all should we be deterred by the fear of renegotiation. I cannot, after all, accept the proposition that immediate ratification of these treaties is more important than guaranteeing the security of the canal and of our national interests. It would be far better that we spend a few more months at the negotiating table, than that we spend the rest of our lives regretting our handling of the treaty issue.

My general concern with the two proposed treaties is the careless and imprecise manner in which they were drafted. It is the ambiguities, the loopholes, and the concessions which disturb me the most, particularly as they relate to American rights of defense and use of the canal. It appears that much of this can be attributed to the undue haste in which they were concluded last year.

ADMINISTRATION CONCESSIONS DURING NEGOTIATIONS

Let us put one idea to rest right now: That is the misconception that these treaties have the weight of four presidential administrations in their favor. In fact, some of the major points of conflict which had been at issue for the past 12 years were suddenly "resolved" within the first 6 months of the Carter Administration. Previous administrations preferred no treaty at all to one which would involve unacceptable concessions. And that is to their credit. America has always taken a stand of principle over appeasement.

When one reviews the record of negotiations during the first 7 months of 1977, however, there is the unmistakable appearance of several important concessions made by the United States—A reflection of this administration's single-minded efforts to conclude a treaty by midyear. The administration's obsession in this regard was no secret, evidenced both by public statements and by the temporary 6-month appointment of a new chief negotiator in February of 1977.

According to information that has come to light in recent weeks, it appears that this administration made critical concession regarding the duration of the initial treaty; regarding the prospect for a continued American military presence following treaty termination; regarding preferential rights of passage for U.S. warships during emergencies; and regarding unilateral U.S. rights to protect the permanent security and neutrality of the canal, these points have surfaced through public statements by officials involved in the negotiations, and through certain documents that have recently come to my attention. I will talk more about these points during forth-coming debate on treaty amendments.

There is no question that the Panamanian Government renewed its old demands with the advent of the new administration. There is no question that subsequent bargaining involved mutual concessions. Negotiations necessarily require a conciliatory attitude on the part of all parties. But the treaty concessions I have just cited involved vital security interests which should have remained non-negotiable from our standpoint. Unfortunately, they did not.

As a result, we have treaty "assurances" which are wrapped in ambiguity, and meaningless rhetoric where there should be iron-clad guarantees. We even find ourselves locked into a commitment for the next 22 years not to build a new canal in any country other than Panama.

In retrospect, it seems evident there should not have been an effort to rush the final stage of negotiations. At present, there is no justification for rushing the final ratification process by our two governments. If we do, we will certainly end up with a treaty that we will regret the generations to come.

SPECIFIC CONCERNS ABOUT TREATIES

Many of my colleagues are concerned along with myself about the vague treaty assurances on future American rights to defend the neutrality of the canal, and to use the canal for our own national Defense purposes. Our misgivings were heightened by contradictory definitions of particular provisions, such as articles IV and VI of the neutrality treaty. One thing is by now very clear: the differences in American and Panamanian interpretations on these points were real—they were not just a matter of "semantics."

THE "SECRET CABLE" AND THE "UNDERSTANDING"

For weeks after the treaties were made public last year, the administration sought to gloss over the differences. When I directed the Senate's attention to a confidential State Department cable in October, however, the realities of the contradictions became apparent. One week later, the joint "Carter-Torrijos Statement of Understanding" was issued, with its text closely modeled after two amendments I had introduced on September 23. The "understanding" was a step in the right direction, but only a first step.

It seems clear that the joint statement of understanding was a direct result of legitimate concerns raised by the State Department cable I presented to the committee on October 5. When Ambassador Sol Linowitz appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on October 19, he admitted that—

Had the issue not been raised here, sir, we don't think it would have been necessary to have this statement of understanding.

With all due humility, I do believe the State Department cable was the catalyst for action by both the committee and the President to clarify our defense and passage rights under the neutrality treaty. Despite criticism leveled at this Senator for releasing the cable—classified for “limited distribution”—I have never doubted that my decision was in the national interest. I believe, in retrospect, that it has served the Senate well in its consideration of the canal treaties.

THE AMENDMENT PROPOSAL

I do want to commend the members of the Foreign Relations Committee for having the good judgment and the foresight to endorse the proposal that the Carter-Torrijos understanding be made a part of the treaty itself. There has been a tremendous reversal in opinion on this point since I introduced treaty amendments Nos. 7 and 8 to that effect on October 17, just 3 days after the statement of understanding was issued. Senator Ernest Hollings introduced a similar proposal as amendment No. 9, and Senator Lloyd Bentsen followed suit with amendments Nos. 13 and 14 last month.

For months following the issuance of the Carter-Torrijos statement, the administration resisted and belittled my contention that clarifications and guarantees need to be written into the treaties themselves. A letter from the State Department to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee last December maintained that an amendment of articles IV and VI of the Neutrality Treaty “is unnecessary from a legal standpoint, and extremely undesirable in terms of maintaining the overall agreement on the treaties reached with Panama—such a step would, moreover, seriously complicate the ratification process.” That was the State Department’s opinion in December of last year. Due to the persistence of this Senator and others, the administration reversed its position 6 weeks later and agreed to the treaty amendment now recommended by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The Senate leadership now supports that amendment as well, and I guess with 77, 78, or 85 cosponsors, one could say chances for approval appear good. But the effort to approve these treaties does not end there.

The Senator from Kansas remembers when it was indicated that he was obstructing the treaty process by offering amendments numbered 7 and 8. I do not hear that now, when those amendments have become amendments numbered 20 and 21 by the leadership. I do not think we should characterize any other amendments that are offered by this Senator or any other Senator as obstructions until we have had a full debate. The American people understand that those of us who have amendments are concerned about our national interests, are concerned about Panamanian interests, and are concerned about getting the best possible treaties.

So we have made progress, but we have not yet reached the objective.

TREATY DEFECTS

The treaties do not yet merit the support of those who would insure the future security interests of the United States.

As the Senator from Kansas indicated, I am not so concerned about the sovereignty dilemma as some others. I am not hung up on whether the canal is sovereign territory or not, or whether we own it in a technical legal sense. I am more concerned about what happens after the year 2000. I am less concerned about from now to the year 2000. We will still have troops there. There will be a presence there. But what happens after the year 2000, after the initial treaty terminates?

For the immediate future, I am bothered by uncertain protections of the rights of U.S. Canal Zone employees, and by excessive payments guaranteed to Panama which will create pressures for higher canal tolls. Maybe it will not hit us for 4, 5, or 6 years, but it is coming. Everyone agrees it is coming.

I am concerned about maintaining U.S. discretion in selecting a site for a new sea-level canal, and about Panamanian progress in the observance of human rights, though I might say it appears they are doing better. They have made progress in the past year, but much remains to be done.

It is for reasons that I seek to improve the treaty language by proposing specific amendments and reservations—not to obstruct the proceedings any more than I was trying to obstruct proceedings with amendments Nos. 7 and 8, which are now amendments Nos. 20 and 21, but as one who seeks assurance of the Nation's welfare.

On September 23 of last year, I proposed six amendments and two reservations to the proposed Panama Canal Treaty and Neutrality Treaty. Those proposals focused on specific problems including American defense and passage rights, payment guarantees for Panama, duration of the transition period, the transfer of U.S. property, human rights, and restrictions on construction of a new sea-level canal. Subsequently, I introduced five additional amendments on October 17, and January 19 of this year. All of them, I believe, go to the heart of the defects and omissions inherent in these treaties.

HEMISPHERIC INTERESTS

Mr. President, we recognize that there is widespread nationalistic support in Panama for regaining full control of the canal and Canal Zone. We also know that there is support for a "new canal arrangement" among many of the Central and Latin American governments. Our friends in this hemisphere should understand that we do value the continuation of our good relations with them. We do want to base our future relationships on a foundation of mutual interest and respect.

But despite all the administration's claims about widespread support for these treaties throughout Latin America, we know that those governments want us to act responsibly in guaranteeing the canal's future security. They want us to do what we can to assure the continuation of low toll rates, efficient operation, and adequate maintenance in the future. To do any less would be to betray their trust in our good judgment, and would betray their own interests in the use of the canal.

As recently as last June, the Organization of American States unanimously adopted a resolution opposing excessive increases in canal tolls. Yet, it is now well known that the payment guarantees for Panama contained within these treaty provisions will necessitate immediate toll increases of as much as 25 to 40 percent—a fact that is sure to concern Latin American countries that are heavy canal users.

Mr. President, this Senator categorically rejects any onus of guilt or remorse on the part of the United States for our involvement with the canal. This Senator rejects any notion that we owe any other nation or nations an apology for our role in building the canal, in operating and maintaining it for 65 years, and in thereby enhancing the standard of living for the people of Panama.

This Senator rejects as well any suggestion that we retreat due to fear of unknown consequences. The governments of all nations must understand that we do not relinquish our presence in the Canal Zone because of veiled threats or direct pressures. They must know, without question, that we reserve all rights to protect the security of the canal when it is threatened, and that we expect to continue to play a vital role throughout this hemisphere. Free, then, of any sense of guilt or intimidation, we should now proceed to thoroughly discuss these treaties in an objective and responsible manner. We owe no less to those we represent, who will be listening carefully in the days ahead, perhaps more carefully than ever before.

A LONG DEBATE

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas suggests, as he did at the outset, that this will be a long debate. It will be a constructive debate. Minds will be changed. Senators who now are uncertain may find, in the course of the debate or in the course of some amendments which will be offered, a way to improve the treaties and make it possible for them to vote for the treaties with certain improvements that go to the heart of the matter; that is, protection of America's vital interests.

Oh, yes, we are concerned about Panama. We know they are a small country, we know of the problems they have. We know about General Torrijos. We know that he has problems. We know there are difficult decisions for the leader of that country to make.

We know it is important to President Carter and we want to help President Carter when we can. It seems to this Senator that one way to assist the President is to make certain that we protect the national interest. Perhaps in the next week or 2 weeks or 3 weeks, amendments will be offered that will appeal to 51 Senators. It only takes 51 to amend the treaties.

It seems to this Senator that one way to assure passage of the treaties, perhaps by a wide margin in this body, is to make certain that we give careful attention to some of the amendments which will be proposed.

I shall only say one more time that there are those who yelled "obstructionism," when this Senator introduced amendments Nos. 7 and 8. I find now that 78 Senators share my early view. I do not see anyone saying they are obstructionist. They say it is a positive step forward.

The leadership has embraced the amendments. They now claim them to be their own. That is fine. That is the prerogative of the leadership. And the Senator from Kansas may want to cosponsor his amendments at the appropriate time.

But I think there has been proof demonstrated, by the fact that the leadership is embracing these amendments, that they know the treaties were vague and they knew the treaties were ambiguous. They knew the political dangers in ratifying the treaties in their original form. They told the President so very candidly. They told the American people. Now they are telling us.

I suggest to my distinguished friends, the majority leader and minority leader, that we share their responsibility. We share their concern. We hope that when we offer amendments, they will share our concern and they will share our responsibility, and they will understand that we offer the amendments in good faith, just as they offer amendments Nos. 20 and 21 in good faith.

This Senator has a feeling that there is going to be a big effort around here to get amendments Nos. 20 and 21 adopted and then claim victory and say it is all over. The Senator from Kansas does not believe that should happen. There is no doubt in my mind that amendments Nos. 20 and 21 will pass. But if we proceed as we should, by first considering the Panama Canal Treaty and trying to make improvements in the Panama Canal Treaty before we get to the second treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal, then I think we can end this debate with a great deal of harmony.

Perhaps at that point, there will be sufficient votes for passage of the treaties. If not, if there is an effort to beat down every amendment, or to adopt amendments Nos. 20 and 21 and say, this is it—these are the big ones, this clarifies the treaty, this is all we need—then I would suggest that the final vote is too close to call.

It seems to this Senator that there should be no fear of renegotiation. There should be no fear of upsetting General Torrijos. We should not concern ourselves with whether or not this is a plus or a minus for this administration or the former administration. We ought to concern ourselves with our responsibilities. I am certain we will. One of our responsibilities is to make certain that we have not overlooked something.

I commend the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. They have worked hard. They heard many, many witnesses, as did the Committee on Armed Services. And I guess, after hearing all the witnesses and after knowing about amendments 20 and 21, the great majority decided that the treaties were no longer flawed. But this Senator does not buy that. We want to make certain these are the best possible treaties that can pass this body.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas will pledge his efforts to be constructive, to keep the debate at the highest level, to offer responsible amendments; and then hope that my colleagues, who may be wavering or may have ideas of their own, will be able to support those amendments.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the treaties today end at 6:30 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Zorinsky). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, after speaking with scores of people, reading voluminous testimony, listening to arguments on all sides of the issue, and visiting firsthand the Republic of Panama and the Canal Zone, I am deeply convinced that the case for approval of these treaties is strong and convincing. The U.S. national interest depends upon the proper use and assured security of the canal, not upon its ownership. And our national interests will be far more secure when Panama and other Latin American nations are our genuine allies—willing and able to cooperate with us and committed to similar, mutually beneficial goals.

I have thought long and hard about this historic issue and this is the final balance sheet I have come up with:

What does the United States gain if we approve these treaties?

The benefits, as I see them, are:

First. These treaties will vastly improve the prospect that the Panama Canal will remain secure, safe, neutral, and open to our commercial and military ships—and the ships of all nations—for now and the indefinite future. Keeping the canal open must be our overriding consideration.

Second. We retain the right for priority passage of U.S. ships in time of emergency.

Third. We retain the right to defend the canal forever against any perceived threat from within or without.

We already have that right of defense. But these treaties make the canal more secure, more safe for a simple—but all too often overlooked—reason: Military hostilities inevitably inflict casualties, and damage on both sides. Even the victor suffers some punishment.

The best way to defend the canal against attack is to take steps to avert an attack in the first place. The best way to protect the canal against damage—even temporary damage and temporary shutdown—is to remove as far as is in our power political provocation that might incite an attack.

Approval of these treaties will remove provocation of an attack against the canal by local nationalists—the very kind of attack to which the canal is most vulnerable.

Without any doubt, American military might can defend the canal and recapture it if recapture is needed. But Vietnam should have taught us that we cannot guarantee the transit of commercial shipping through the canal if ships are subjected to guerrilla attack in passage.

We do not want the canal closed to commercial traffic for years because of guerrilla warfare in the jungles of Panama.

We do not want the canal closed to our naval vessels for days or weeks or possibly months because of guerrilla warfare in the jungles of Panama and damage that guerrillas might inflict upon the canal.

Fourth. Approval of these treaties will right what all of Latin America has for generations perceived as a wrong. Approval of these treaties will establish us as the good neighbor we have always claimed we wanted to be, but have never quite succeeded in persuading anyone we were.

Fifth. Approval of these treaties will improve our image and our relations with all the nations of the Third World who see in our armed presence in the Canal Zone a vestige of the detested colonialism that they rebelled against—the very colonialism we ourselves rebelled against in our own Revolution.

Some people look upon the canal as a symbol of American power and ingenuity. But the canal has also become a symbol of American colonialism in an era when colonialism is in rightful disrepute. It is time for us to desymbolize the Panama Canal.

Sixth. Finally I believe these treaties will improve our relations—political, military, and commercial—with all the nations of the world. Approval will show us to be a strong, self-confident nation capable of dealing fairly with a small, developing country.

It will demonstrate to the world that we have the real, inner strength of the truly powerful—not the false bravado of the frightened bully.

Now, what would the United States lose if the Senate rejects the treaties—or emasculates them with demeaning amendments that would compel the Panamanians to reject them out of national pride and self-respect?

First. We increase the odds for domestic unrest that could imperil the peaceful passage of our ships.

Second. We increase the chances of a takeover of the Panamanian Government by right-wing—or left-wing—forces, thus further jeopardizing the canal.

Third. We raise the cost to us—in dollars and cents—in having to defend the canal against a disillusioned and possibly hostile populace and worse yet, in human lives. That cost could far exceed any monetary loss in ceding the canal—and I am speaking of American lives and Panamanian lives.

Fourth. And finally we lose that “decent respect for the opinions of mankind” that motivated our Declaration of Independence 200 years ago.

Once again we are being called upon to show a “decent respect for the opinions of mankind.” Let us live up to our heritage.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, we are today setting the framework of this debate and we will get into many of the finite details as the days go on. So I would like to address myself to the framework within which I believe these treaties should both be recommended for ratification by the President, which is the practical procedure, and why it is in the highest national interest of the United States that this be done.

Mr. President, we do not live in isolation. We live in a time of history. In a real sense the United States in respect of the Panama Canal has been defying history, and those who defy history are condemned to relive it and reliving it may involve this country in such difficulties, including war, as to call for an acceptance rather than a rejection of these treaties.

Mr. President, I hasten to say immediately that we are not, I hope, and I certainly will not lend myself to that, going to simply say to every effort to amend or to make a reservation or to make a declaration, we cannot do that, we do not wish to negotiate these treaties again, the matter is laid at rest with the adoption of the two amendments which are recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee, and that is the end of that.

Of course, it will be my duty and it will be the duty of every other Senator to examine, as we did in the Foreign Relations Committee—of which I have the honor to be a member—every one of the amendments proposed by Senator Dole or Senator Laxalt or any other Senator, with a view toward improving the position of the United States in respect of this very difficult situation, if we can.

However, Mr. President, I do not believe that it should be made an argument for these amendments and reservations that we intend to turn them all down simply because we do not want to contend with them. I do not believe we should be prejudiced either way. We should consider them, we should debate them, and we should vote them up or down, as we deem them to be in the best interests of the situation.

It is for this reason that I supported the two amendments which the Foreign Relations Committee has recommended, because I believe in what they call for—the absolute unilateral right of the United States, after the year 2000, to defend this canal with whatever means it took, and whether or not it was on the territory of the Republic of Panama, itself; second, that in case of need, the war and auxiliary vessels of the United States would be entitled, upon the unilateral determination of the United States, to traverse the canal with the first priority over every other vessel.

Mr. President, I did that because I believe that is what the treaty says, the Neutrality Treaty, in article IV, as to the right to unilaterally determine that the canal neutrality is endangered and in article VI as to the right for priority passage of our war vessels, in case of need, through the canal.

Mr. President, where there was such a very general view that these were the two critical matters in respect of the treaty that had to be crystal clear beyond construction or interpretation of any kind or character, and where the Panamanians themselves concur, through the statement made by President Carter and General Torrijos in that declaration, I saw no reason why we should not adopt it as an amendment or a reservation or a declaration, or whatever anybody wished.

In short, there is no use going out and looking for trouble in respect of these treaties, if, by taking this action, we satisfy those who had any doubts on the subject that there was no room for doubt. But that does not mean that that is an open license to try to get the treaty turned down or to try to get the treaty made impossible of implementation because of the number or nature of the amendments which are thrown up against it.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment it was right and proper to support these amendments, and I am a cosponsor of them, and I am proud to be. But I do not believe that they were essential, except insofar as reassurance was concerned to many Members who wanted these particular points made crystal clear.

For those reasons, I hope very much that the treaties will be adopted.

It is very critical that this matter be looked at down the long corridor of history. This should be and will be, if I can have anything to do with it, a critically important part of the debate, because we are an anomaly in the world. The fact that the United States controls the Panama Canal with the exclusivity that it does is an anomaly in this world.

Indeed, the whole of international law, all international opinion, all the stirrings and risings of the developing nations of the world, are directed exactly the other way. The fact is, too, that our history here is not unbloody, and let us not shut our eyes to that. The fact is that in 1964, in a real fracas in the Panama Canal, in respect of the Panama Canal, on this very issue which we face here, as to how it should be operated and run and whether or not we should assert the sovereignty over it which many would like to impute to us, many lives were lost.

Mr. President, that is history. The fact is that there was a war in respect of the Suez Canal, a war in which the United States took a very heavy responsibility to call off the forces of its two principal allies in Europe, France and the United Kingdom, and the forces of Israel, because the United States, back then in 1956, subscribed to the proposition that colonialism, in whatever guise, was dead and that it was no longer possible in this world to hold on with that degree of control to the kind of property which the United States, if the opponents of these treaties have their way, has asserted in respect of the Panama Canal.

In that respect, I must say that I look with great concern upon assertions, as I have heard already on this floor and that have been made in the public debate, that the United States is paying the Panamanians for taking the canal off our hands. One of the most shocking elements of the canal performance has been the way in which we have dealt with Panama on the question of payment. The fact is that, in essence, we are still paying today at 1903 rates. The fact also is, notwithstanding many of the contentions which have been made about this issue, that the United States has practically paid out everything it invested in the canal.

Indeed, I quote now from the testimony of Under Secretary of the Treasury Solomon, at page 434 of the testimony on this subject in which he says:

The total financial flows to and from the canal from the Treasury since the very inception of the building of the canal resulted in a situation where we have received everything back excepting about $58 million.

That is a very great difference from the assertions that we are paying the Panamanians to take the canal off our hands.

Mr. President, the virtue of these treaties, which must be very seriously weighed in their favor, is this 23-year lapse on the part of the United States in turning over the control and the operation of the canal to the Panamanians. Twenty-three years—an almost unheard of period in affairs of this character. Twenty-three years that the United States can administer this canal, in a commission which is five-to-four United States, where the principal operating official until 1990 will be a U.S. national. That, it seems to me, is the absolutely clinching argument for the worth of these treaties. A quarter of a century to put this matter in shape and to put it in focus, and all the time relieving us of the responsibility for treating it as a colonial possession; and with a gradually developing and intelligent and maturing cooperation with the people and the Government of Panama.

Mr. President, I have no illusions about President Torrijos and how long he is going to be there, any more than I have illusions about President Carter and how long he is going to be there. The most he can be there will be 7 years, if he succeeds in being reelected. As to President Torrijos, we have no idea as to the duration of his term. But the canal will be there, and the people of the United States and the people of Panama will be there; and these are the interests and the relationships which are essential to keep inviolate.

Nothing in life is perfect. We cannot guarantee to the opponents of these treaties that there will be no trouble about the situation once these treaties are ratified and approved; nor can we make predictions—not the best experts who testified can make predictions beyond 1984 or 1985—about the financial situation which will involve the operation of the canal and whether it will continue to be economically viable.

But we have to compare, Mr. President, those eventualities as they would exist under the treaty with the eventualities which would exist absent the treaty. And Mr. President, absent the treaty what have you got? You have got the 1903 so-called Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, an absolute paragon and model of gunboat diplomacy and the big stick which the United States consummated after the flush of victory in the Spanish-American War. That is what happened and, Mr. President, I would think it would be unanimous in the United States that that day is gone and gone forever, and yet our opponents would have us believe that it still persists and that in the absence of these treaties we can, I know we can, and everybody knows we can go back to this 1903 Teddy Roosevelt dictated treaty to a small people who just got their head above the ground, revolting against Columbia, a revolt which most historians attribute to the activities of the United States itself.

Mr. President, we are not living in a dream world and so we have to have treaties. There is no other way. And let us see then which are the best treaties for our country and for the peace of the Americas and for justice in the world.

I believe that the absolutely decisive factor—and I suppose I will be arguing the law on many things in this matter, the two-House approval and many other things, and that will come another day—but to me the basic reason for ratification is that we have a quarter of a century to learn to live intelligently and in friendship and amity in this new framework.

Mr. President, I have enough confidence in the sense of justice, decency, and fairness of the American people and in the need of the Panamanian people, which is clearly recognizable, to believe that that will give us an opportunity to establish for all time, so long as this canal is useful at all, a relationship between a very large and powerful country and a small and weak country which will be truly a model of modern times, and that is that might does not make right.

So I hope very much, Mr. President, that these treaties within that framework and within that spirit will be approved.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I wish to congratulate him on this statement. He indicated that there is no way that we can predict with certainty to assure the opponents of these treaties as to what the economic realities may be, in 1985 or a few years hence. Is it true that we cannot predict with certainty what those economic realities may be under the 1903 treaty?

Mr. JAVITS. Of course.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And is it also true that one cannot predict with certitude the economic realities that may exist 10 years hence with respect to any number of other matters, not just the Panama Canal subject itself?

Mr. JAVITS. There is no question about it, Mr. President, and Senator Byrd, it so happens that I spoke this very morning with deep feeling and with an enormous load of evidence on the danger that 1979-80 could face us with one of the most dangerous monetary and economic crises which we faced in the latter half of this century and so what we are trying to do is to be provident, and it seems to me that the best insurance policy for providence was this quarter of a century in which we learned how to make this work.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes; so we are faced with a myriad of uncertainties and we attempt to view the future not just with respect to the Panama Canal operations themselves, and whether or not we are operating 10 years hence under the 1903 treaty or under the new treaties.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly, and the auspices of the new treaty according as it does in modern terms with the aspirations of small peoples—that is small in terms of their country and the economic, political, and diplomatic power of those countries—is just as day is to night compared to this 1903 treaty to which we would revert if these treaties were turned down.

I believe that we should simply judge them on whether they are the best thing to do, but we should not damn them because we do not make a lot of amendments if they do not need it. We do not have to invite trouble, and at the same time we should be perfectly willing to give every reassurance we can, without tearing down the structure of these treaties, as Senator Byrd and Senator Baker propose to do.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the majority leader.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hodges). Senator Clark from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, much has already been made this afternoon about the issue of the real position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff of our military on the questions of the wisdom of these two treaties, and I think there will be a great deal made of it as the debate goes on because I think the American people and the Members of this body respect very greatly the views held by former members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and present sitting members of the heads of various military components.

We took this question up in the Foreign Relations Committee in some detail, and I would like to read sections both contrary and favorable to the position that the Joint Chiefs were really speaking for themselves because this becomes a critical issue. Many of the people that I have talked to in my home State and in other parts of the country are concerned about whether in fact the United States and our defense posture is improved or not by these treaties. So if I might read from some of the hearings that dealt very specifically with this question—I am reading from the hearings of the Committee on Foreign Relations, part I, administration witnesses, page 155.

(Senator Clark speaking now to the Joint Chiefs:)

Senator CLARK. Gentlemen, some of the most bitter critics of the treaty say that those of you in the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the higher ranks of the military command are supporting this treaty in fear of maintaining or enhancing your positions. They say that you are being intimidated. What is your response to these accusations?

General BROWN. Senator, I just turned to Secretary Brown to ask if he would mind if I made an unsolicited statement at some point to get this on the record. I thank you for your question. The rules are quite clear and I think understood by all of us that nobody, no senior officer in uniform will remain on active duty and publicly be critical of a Presidential decision. I, in my role as chairman, and other members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff will articulate as forcefully and as logically as we can the view the Joint Chiefs of Staff hold on issues of national security, but if the judgment goes against us as it does in many cases, there is nothing in the law that says the President has to accept our advice, but we have to give it.

We don't go public without leaving active duty first in doing so. However, the rules are also quite clear that in response to interrogation before a congressional committee that we answer fully and factually. The public record is quite clear where we have been in opposition to a Presidential decision. I can cite two cases. One, and I am sure this comes as no surprise, was the B-1. The second was in January, the Joint Chiefs of Staff urged that the President not plan to withdraw the 2nd U.S. Division from Korea unless three things were made part of that program. One was that the drawdown be done in such a manner that the military balance on the peninsula not be disturbed. Second, that we make public a pledge of our continued support of the Mutual Security Treaty with the Republic of Korea, and third, that we remain a Pacific power. Those three conditions the President accepted, and it became part of his program, at which point the Joint Chiefs of Staff endorsed the program.

So, it is wrong to say that in the case of the Panama Canal we are doing this only because a decision has been made. I have personally worked very diligently for 4 years to achieve these treaties with Ambassador Bunker and subsequently with Ambassador Linowitz also, and as we have testified, the key point that finally found its expression in a treaty of neutrality was conceived within the Defense Department. We have worked hard for this treaty because we feel it is right.

Senator CLARK. Admiral, do you concur in that view?

Admiral LONG. Senator Clark, let me first of all speak for Admiral Holloway, the Chief of Naval Operations. I probably have as close a relationship with him as any naval officer on active duty. I can assure you and this committee that he has had absolutely no pressure placed upon him to form a position that would be contrary to his own belief.

As I indicated earlier, this statement that I have presented to you this morning was personally written by Admiral Holloway. This was not something that was prepared for him by the staff; he personally wrote it.

I think that Admiral Holloway has indicated on several occasions before committees or the Congress where he has had personal views that were divergent to the administration, when queried. Having had the privilege of testifying before several committees of this Congress, I also am well aware of the necessity and the procedures by which a witness is required, and expected, to give his own personal views, if asked.

So, I would just like to assure you, sir, that there has been absolutely no pressure placed upon the Chief of Naval Operations to form this opinion.

Senator CLARK. General, as Commander of the Panama Canal Zone area, what is your own personal view with regard to the treaty?

General McAULIFFE. Senator, my own personal view is completely consistent with my professional view. Let me say that somewhat similarly to General Brown. Over the past 2 years during which I have been the commander of the Southern Command and stationed in the Panama Canal Zone, I have worked with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and, of course, with our negotiating team, for a new treaty, and in order to assure that our defense requirements, as best I could assess them, now and in the future, were adequately and sufficiently taken care of. I can assure you that this is how I come down on this issue.

Senator CLARK. I think all three of you have been very direct in your answers and very strong. I think it is appropriate that you do that because we hear this accusation from time to time.

Of course, it is a very serious accusation and if it were true, it would mean that you were putting your own careers above the interests of the Nation; it would mean that your relationship with the President of the United States is more important than the national defense of the country from the highest military officials of this land. So that is a pretty serious charge. If it were true, then I think the national defense would not have much going for it in any case.

Secretary Brown, you look like you want to say something.

Secretary BROWN. Yes, Senator Clark. I would like to say something about this because I think perhaps my uniformed colleagues cannot say it. It is this. The kind of charge to which you are referring—which clearly you do not share since you are not personally expressing it—is an insult to our senior military officials. I believe it is not helpful to the debate, any more than it would be helpful to the debate if the proponents of the treaty were to question the motives, the integrity, or the honesty of those who oppose it.

Senator CLARK. That is exactly right.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say that there is a rollcall vote on.

I am giving you all this because I do not want to be selective in terms of the debate as it goes on, because it becomes more controversial.

Senator GLENN. Would the Senator yield for a comment on that point?

Senator CLARK. I yield for a comment from Senator Glenn.

Senator GLENN. I might say to the witnesses that I think the memory of General Singlaub has not been forgotten in the halls of Congress yet, and I think that is what feeds into some of this. I think when we have four former CNO's who take exception to this and all those on active duty are unanimous in their opinions on the other side, it cannot help but raise serious questions. I have been leaning toward approval of this, so I do not speak as one opposed to the treaty. But I think it is very serious when we have Admirals Carney, Anderson, Burke, and Moorer speaking out in opposition to this and those on active duty directly opposing them because it raises a question as to what their motivation is and who is best motivated in this area, knowing what happened to a previous man who disagreed with the administration.

So, I think that does linger over this a little bit. I would hope that if anyone has any reservations about this they would certainly speak out.

That is what is behind some of the questions that Senator Clark has raised. I know it has been in my mind a bit, and I find this extreme unanimity of opinion on one side and the other side a little difficult to cope with.

Secretary BROWN. The unanimity of opponents is more presumed, than real, Senator Glenn.

Admiral Zumwalt, who also is a former Chief of Naval Operations, supports the treaty. He gets considerably less publicity.

Senator GLENN. I found it difficult to just dismiss four CNO's as old battleship admirals who no longer have a valuable contribution.

Secretary BROWN. I do not dismiss them, nor do I question their integrity or their honesty. I have some question about how well informed they may have been since they signed the letter before the texts of the treaties were available.

Senator GLENN. Perhaps we could prevail upon them to recant their previous sins now that they have seen the light.

And so on.

General BROWN. Senator Glenn, I would also like to comment upon this.

And he comments:

I would just like to make a comment on the Singlaub affair. I don't propose that it be reopened here, but I think it only fair to say it has been mentioned by the people with whom I have talked about this—and it has been brought up to me as I have traveled around the country—you are absolutely right in how they understand it. But they really misunderstand it. They fail to recognize one fundamental thing that we cannot have in a military organization if we are to have a disciplined military force responsive to proper authority. This is, that once a decision is made, you support it or you get out and contest it. You don't stay on active duty and contest it.

That is where I must draw the line.

Senator GLENN. General, I hope nothing I indicated was to the contrary. I spent 23 years in the Marine Corps and I am fully familiar with that and I agree with it completely. It is the only way we have to maintain a working military organization. If we ever lose that structure and lose that discipline, we will be through with our military structure in this country. So, I support that fully.

But where people have lined up so much on one side and the other on this with apparent unanimity of opinion, it did raise some questions in view of what has happened that I think are good to bring out at these hearings so that we can clarify them. That was my point.

The discussion at that point ends and goes on to another matter. I hesitate to read all of it into the Record at this point, except to say that it seems to me that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have made a very clear point, that simply being that in their judgment they are required by law, when appearing before a congressional committee, to give their honest views; and, indeed, they cite two examples in this testimony where they did precisely that, in the case of the B-1 bomber, where they opposed the President's position until it was changed, and did so publicly, and in the case of the B-1 bomber, where they opposed the President's decision and did so publicly.

There is no good reason, it seems to me, to believe that if they are prepared to take a position in opposition to the Commander in Chief when asked and required to do so in accordance with the rules of both Houses of Congress, that they would decide not to do so in the case of the Canal Treaty if they absolutely felt it was not in the national defense interests of the United States.

(Mr. Stone assumed the Chair).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I compliment the Senator for his reference to the support which has been expressed for the treaties by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Joint Chiefs themselves.

These are the people who are currently responsible for the defense of this country, are they not?

Mr. CLARK. This is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. These are the men who currently have the duty—not yesterday, not a year ago, not just 2 years ago, but now—is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. This is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator consider this to be an important point which ought to be made for the record?

Mr. CLARK. I believe so.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In other words, the men who are responsible today, not 10 years ago, for planning for the defense and security of this country support these treaties.

Mr. CLARK. That is exactly right. And I believe the Senator makes a good point. I really do agree with what Secretary Brown said before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. That is that it is an insult to these military leaders to say that somehow they are not interested in the highest defense interests of this country. I think they are testifying to their own integrity.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Or it impugns their patriotism.

Mr. CLARK. That is right.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe it is important that the Senator has stated, and it should be stressed, that the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, the people who are responsible today—not those who were responsible 10 years ago perhaps—who under today's conditions, and looking forward to the future, are in support, unanimously in support, of these treaties. Am I correct?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. Laxalt. That may will be. I will not minimize the impact of having the endorsement of the existing and present Joint Chiefs. But is it not also true that the vast majority of the retired Joint Chiefs are in solid opposition to these treaties?

Mr. CLARK. Well, I do not have any count. I know that Admiral Zumwalt, of course, is in favor, but the others that I quoted are opposed.

Mr. LAXALT. Admittedly, they are not currently in charge. Admittedly, their information may not be as current or topical. But surely we here in the Senate, and the American people, have a right to observe and perhaps properly regard their opinions in this matter, is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. I think it is entirely correct.

Mr. LAXALT. I might point out, if the Senators are not already aware, that within the past few weeks there was a secret poll conducted of some 300 retired flag officers who had served previously in this part of the world. Of those polled, only six favored these treaties. I think in order to make the record complete it should be pointed out that to the extent indicated there is a sharp division among the military people.

Mr. CLARK. I do not question that. Really, the point I wanted to make, and make very clearly, and which I think the testimony makes, is simply this: Those people who argue that the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff really do not favor this treaty, that somehow they are only doing that because their Commander in Chief favors it, are doing a great disservice to them. I think they have made a great case here in pointing out illustrations of when they have opposed the Commander in Chief, the B-1 bomber being a recent example and the withdrawal of troops from Korea being another.

One can disagree honestly over the treaties, military officials, former and present, but my feeling is that the present Joint Chiefs of Staff are unanimous in their honest opinion that the proposed treaties will serve the national interests of the United States better than the existing treaties. I am only trying to deal with the question of their forthrightness and their honesty in coming to their position. Admirals Berg and Zumwalt, and others, I am sure, are equally forthright and honest in coming to their position.

Many people around the country, some in this city, have suggested from time to time that, in fact, the Joint Chiefs are not being entirely open and honest in giving their candid opinion. I agree with Secretary Brown and with their own comments I have read into the Record. I think they are honest about it and they are giving us their points of view. I would like to have that point well established. I am particularly pleased with the fact that the Senator from Nevada, I believe, shares that opinion. I yield the floor.

Mr. Allen addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered into, we only have 3 more minutes of debate tonight on this subject. I would like to comment on the statement that the Joint Chiefs say that the canal can better be defended under the proposed treaties than it could be defended under the existing treaties.

The signed agreements provide that as soon as the Panama Canal Treaty is agreed to, the bases of the United States in Panama immediately drop from 14 to 4, and that at the end of this century we pull out all of our troops.

I do not care if the Joint Chiefs have the military genius of Napoleon, to say that we can better defend the canal with 4 bases than 14, and that we can better defend the canal with no troops there after the end of this century than having 14 bases there, just does not make good sense.

Certainly, at the end of this century if we do go back in after we have withdrawn all of our troops, if we go back in to protect the neutrality of the canal, we have to go back in, in effect, as invaders. We would have to go in by amphibious landing or by dropping paratroopers. We do not know what effect that would have on some of our potential enemies around the globe. Russia or Cuba would take a dim view of our invading Panama for the purpose of defending the canal.

I do not care what the Joint Chiefs say, it does not make sense to say that we would better defend the canal with 4 bases than with 14, and that at the end of the century we could defend the canal better with no troops there than under our present arrangement in having 14 bases there.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is it not true that under the 1903 treaty, the United States has no legal right to complain if a foreign country sets up a military garrison in Panama today outside the Canal Zone; whereas, the treaties which are being debated, if ratified, would provide that no foreign power would be allowed to set up a military post or garrison anywhere in Panama? In that respect, the new treaties are a great improvement over the 1903 treaties. That is after the year 2000.

Mr. ALLEN. Yet the new treaty provides that we cannot intervene in the internal affairs of Panama, and Panama might be the very offender. They might be the person or the country that was forbidding us to use the canal. They might be the barrier; they might be the enemy. But we pledge that under no circumstances will we come in and interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

Certainly, if they were forbidding our use of the canal, if we moved in to force our right to use the canal, that would be interfering with the internal affairs of Panama.

Mr. President, inasmuch as the allotted time has expired, I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, article V of the Neutrality Treaty provides—and it is very brief—in the following sentence:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

Under the 1903 treaty, Mr. President, this protection is not provided. Any foreign power can, at this point or after the year 2000, station a military garrison in Panama and the United States would have no legal right to complain as long as that garrison were located outside the Panama Canal Zone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must rule that, pursuant to the previous order, the debate on the Panama Canal treaties will now terminate, the hour of 6:30 having arrived.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I congratulate Members of the Senate, who have carried on a very instructional debate. I commend them, both those who have presented views in support of and those who have presented views in opposition to the treaties.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS SUBMITTED

Mr. MCGOVERN. Mr. President, I was pleased and proud to note that the January 4-7 issue of the Christian Century contained one of the best discussions I have yet seen on the Panama Canal treaties. The article was written by the president of Dakota Wesleyan University, Dr. Donald Messer, of Mitchell, S. Dak.

Dr. Messer was among a number of Americans who spent a day in Washington in November receiving briefings on the treaties from President Carter and other administration officials. In my view he has performed a real service to the country by collecting the most pertinent facts from those sessions, combining them with imaginative arguments of his own, and setting them forth for a wider audience in a highly readable form.

He addresses with particular cogency the question whether these treaties represent a retreat by the United States. Dr. Messer writes:

Actually, the opposite can be argued; it is evidence of a nation's greatness when it can live in peace and partnership with its neighbors. Gunboat-diplomacy days are long gone; the U.S. promotes the self-determination and development of nations, unlike the communists in eastern Europe who continue to practice a form of colonialism.

Mr. President, because I believe it will be of interest and help to my colleagues as we approach the debates on the Panama Canal treaties, I ask unanimous consent that the article I have described, entitled "Panama Canal Treaties: Answering Questions on Main-Street America," be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: ANSWERING QUESTIONS ON MAIN STREET AMERICA

(By Donald E. Messer)

Almost unnoticed in the wake of the world drama of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's journey to Jerusalem was a mobilization meeting on Friday November 18 of grass-roots American citizens concerned with peace in the western hemisphere.

Summoned to meet President Jimmy Carter at the White House, over 1,000 leaders, Democrats and Republicans from every part of the United States, spent a day being briefed on the Panama Canal treaties. Almost unprecedented, at least in recent times, is the degree of presidential prestige and persuasion being applied in the interests of treaty ratification.

Prompting Carter's effort in the realization that the treaties are in jeopardy: the majority of Americans are opposed to them, and treaty opponents have launched a well-financed campaign to exploit this sentiment. Republicans particularly are being subjected to a political litmus test of true conservatism. While Ronald Reagan is the best-known spokesman for this perspective, members of the American Conservative Union have for some months been carrying on a highly organized crusade, sponsoring petitions, speaking on radio/TV talk shows, producing mass mailings, and generating antitreaty letters and petitions to Congress.

The White House Conference was directed by a bipartisan group called the Committee of Americans for the Canal Treaties (COACT), headed by Averill Harriman and former Senate minority leader Hugh Scott. Speakers defending the treaties included Vice-President Walter Mondale; former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger; Sol M. Linowitz, U.S. treaty negotiator (with Ellsworth Bunker); Secretary of the Navy W. Graham Clayton, Jr.; and Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge.

In welcoming his White House guests, Carter asked for help, noting that supporters "will not be received with gratitude" when they defend the treaties, for they are "not yet popular." What an understatement from a man noted for hyperbole! In South Dakota one high school poll showed 90 percent of students opposed, with the other 10 percent saying it was OK to "give [the canal] away." A recent New York Times/CBS nationwide poll revealed that 29 per cent approved, 49 per cent disapproved, and 22 per cent had no opinion.

NEEDED: A CLIMATE OF PUBLIC UNDERSTANDING

Evidence suggests, however, that the American people could be persuaded to change their minds, if they were to receive accurate information regarding the treaties. Many conscientious citizens on main-street America, though initially opposed to the treaties, are open to hearing new information. People are confused, victims of a jingoistic third-grade educational past, an emotional antitreaty campaign, and the failure of political, civic, church and educational leaders to address their doubts and concerns. When the Times/CBS poll put the question differently, asking respondents if they would support ratification if it were certain "that the United States could always send in troops to keep the canal open to ships of all nations," then 63 per cent approved, 24 per cent disapproved, and 13 per cent had no opinion. Ironically, the treaties do give America precisely that right of military intervention, but the American people don't know it.

Mere passage of the Panama treaties is insufficient. A climate of public understanding is critically needed. Indications are that two-thirds of the Senate can be persuaded but that many need "home" support. Pushing through to passage with only minority public support could have negative consequences in the long run. The political alienation fostered by the Vietnam war, Watergate and Koreagate would deepen. More critical would be the undermining of President Carter's ability to conduct the foreign affairs of this nation with authority and confidence. The public needs to understand and approve the Panama Canal treaties: otherwise, efforts toward a new SALT pact or negotiations in South Africa or the Mideast could be severely weakened.

Now, for the first time since the 1960s civil rights movement, church people have an opportunity to join with the administration in a bipartisan political and educational effort to influence a policy decision for peace and goodwill in the western hemisphere. The Senate vote is expected by the end of March 1978. In the next few weeks, grass-roots Americans must speak out.

AMERICA'S INVOLVEMENT IN PANAMA

Even the simplest recitation of the history of America's involvement in Panama will provide more information than most Americans remember. Few have given the matter consistent, thoughtful attention, yet now most feel emotionally involved. Capturing this mood was a recent cartoon of two men, one saying: "I don't know what is the matter with me. For 30 years I never thought about the Panama Canal and now I can't live without it." These widespread feelings are what opponents are accentuating, believing that this is "one of those few issues that come along every ten or fifteen years in which a politician can make or break himself with one vote" (Richard A. Viguerie, quoted in "The New Activists," Newsweek, November 7, 1977, p. 41).

Most Americans are surprised to learn the circumstances and details of the original Panama Canal treaty. The facts of our involvement stand in sharp contrast to our historic ideals and our commitment to international justice, fair play and the self-determination of peoples.

It was the French who first attempted to build a canal across the Isthmus of Panama to give ships a more direct route between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The French company went bankrupt, and Philippe-Bunau-Varilla, a French stockholder, approached the United States government in 1903. Recognizing the commercial and military value of a shortcut linking the Atlantic and the Pacific, the United States approached the government of Colombia and offered a treaty that would give the U.S. 100-year use of a six-mile swath of land through the province of Panama in exchange for $10 million and $250,000 annual rent. The Colombian legislature refused, arguing that the proposal was unreasonable.

The province was ripe for revolution. With American foreknowledge, if not assistance from military ships offshore, the Panamanians declared their independence and new nationhood. Three days later the United States recognized the new government and 12 days later signed a treaty for building a canal and creating a special zone. No Panamanians were even present; the treaty was signed by the Frenchman, Bunau-Varilla, who benefited significantly when the U.S. purchased his assets.

From the beginning the fairness of the treaty has been questionable. The offer rejected by the Colombians was far better than the agreement the Panamanians accepted. Rather than for a term of 100 years, the U.S. would hold the strip of land in "perpetuity"; not six miles but ten miles would be carved out of the center of their country. And "all the rights, power, and authority" were given to the U.S. as "if it were the sovereign of the territory." A new nation, which owed its independence to America's military might, and had no bargaining power; it had to sign. Secretary of State John Hay, who signed for the United States, later wrote a U.S. Senator that it was "vastly advantageous to the United States, and we must confess, with what face we can muster, not so advantageous to Panama. @.@ You and I know too well how many points there are in this treaty to which a Panamanian patriot could object" (quoted in Panama Canal: The New Treaties [Department of State, 1977], publication 8924, p. 5).

The construction of the canal fired America's imagination. From 1904 to 1914 America's spirit and technological know-how were pitted against enormous problems of topography, jungle disease and other hardships. It was "our moonshot of the early 1900s," according to Sol Linowitz. Built and run not for a profit but as a public service to the world, the canal has benefited ships of every nation.

Over the years minor treaty adjustments have been made, including an increase in the yearly payment to Panama to $2.3 million. Especially irritating to Panamanians, however, was the Canal Zone—the "little America"—in the heart of their country.

Actually it surprises many main-street Americans to learn of this colonial strip of land, ten miles wide and 51 miles long. Just ask how they would like for their state to be divided in two, with 10,000 foreign troops and eight military bases occupying a strip down the middle. This simple exercise in "walking in another's moccasins" helps one imaginatively to see the issue as the Panamanian people see it (cf. "Bought and Paid For"? A Historical Look at the Panama Canal Issue," by Raymond K. DeHainaut, Christian Century, July 7-14, 1976, pp. 629-631).

This anticolonial resentment exploded in 1964, resulting in the deaths of 24 people (20 Panamanians and four Americans). President Lyndon Johnson, after consultation with Presidents Truman and Eisenhower, began negotiations for a new treaty which finally reached fruition in 1977. Though Carter signed for the United States, the document really represents the bipartisan diplomacy of the past seven presidents. As former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger says, "If only two more states had voted differently, it would have been the Ford-Kissinger treaty."

PROVISIONS OF THE TWO NEW TREATIES

Technically there are two treaties: one called the "Panama Canal Treaty" and the other the "Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal." Interrelated, both need ratification by a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate.

The "Panama Canal Treaty" terminates and supersedes previous treaties and defines how the canal is to be operated and defended until the year 2000. Briefly, six provisions can be outlined: First, it is agreed that the United States will have prime responsibility for defense and canal operations until 2000, with increasing Panamanian participation during this time. Right now, 70 per cent of the canal work force is Panamanian, so transition should not be difficult. Second, in three years the Canal Zone will cease to exist and Panama will assume general jurisdiction. The U.S. retains its military bases until 2000.

Third, the canal will be operated by an American governmental agency, the Panama Canal Commission, made up of five Americans and four Panamanians, until the end of the century. The U.S. thus sets the rate of tolls for the next 22 years. Fourth, there are extensive provisions protecting the security and rights of current U.S. employees.

Fifth, Panama and the U.S. agree to study the desirability and feasibility of putting a new canal through Panama. A new sea-level canal (in contrast to the current one utilizing a complicated lock system) would be easier to defend militarily and would permit passage of larger ships. The U.S. will not attempt to build a canal in another Latin nation, and Panama has agreed not to construct a canal with the help of another country.

Sixth, Panama will immediately begin to receive more money from its most important economic asset, the canal. It will receive 30 cents per Panama Canal ton. Depending on traffic, this figure could total $40 to $50 million yearly. Additionally, an annuity of $10 million is guaranteed, and up to another $10 million is possible if revenues permit. All of this money comes from canal operating revenues, not from congressional appropriations.

The "Neutrality Treaty" is what its name suggest; it ensures that the canal "shall be permanently neutral"—open to commercial and naval vessels, without discrimination as to conditions or tolls. In time of national need, the "vessels of war and auxiliary vessels" of both the U.S. and Panama are "entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously."

Contrary to popular main-street American understanding, the treaty does provide that the United States has a right to intervene militarily after the year 2000 to ensure the canal's neutrality and the passage of America's warships. Controversy over whether Panama and the U.S. concurred in this interpretation resulted in a return visit to Washington this fall on the part of Panama's president, General Omar Torrijos. Since Carter and Torrijos issued a joint communique, affirming America's right to intervene militarily and "in case of need or emergency to go to the head of the line," this controversy has subsided somewhat.

Outlining a brief history and explicating the basic provisions of the treaties will resolve numerous queries. Yet most Americans are seeking an agenda of answers to their own questions and those raised by the vocal and active opponents of ratification. What follows are answers to typical questions being posed by main-street Americans today. No listing can be complete, but basically there are four types of concerns—those relating to sovereignty, costs, security and the American spirit.

1. "Why should we give away what is ours?" There are many variations on this "bought and paid for" or "giving back Alaska and the Louisiana Territory" argument. Some congressmen have even joined in a lawsuit against the president, contending that the treaties are "an unconstitutional giveaway of U.S. territory." Columnist Peter Reich of the Chicago Tribune suggests that next we will have to "show the Russians our good faith by turning Alaska back to them."

Sovereignty is the critical question—the U.S. has never owned or held title to the Panamanian land. The original treaty gave America "rights, power, and authority" as "if it were the sovereign of the territory." We bought Alaska in 1867 and the Louisiana Territory in 1803; in those cases there is no doubt as to our sovereignty. Even John Foster Dulles, Eisenhower's secretary of state, acknowledged in the United Nations that Panama never relinquished sovereignty over its land. A child born to non-American parents in the Zone has never been granted American citizenship. These slogans for sovereignty are not based in historical legal fact or practices.

Gradually turning over the operation of the Zone and the canal to Panama certainly falls within the best traditions and ideals of America. As an enemy of colonialism and champion of freedom, the U.S. voluntarily gave freedom to the Philippines in 1946 and refused to occupy its defeated enemies Japan and Germany. The rights of longtime friend Panama must likewise be respected.

THE BOTTOM LINE

2. "Shouldn't Panama give us money, instead of America paying Panama?" Related are rumors of secret money deals and fears of another "rip-off" of American taxpayers.

To the various questions of cost, at least five responses can be given. First, America can be proud that it has never operated the canal to make money. Our interests has been to ensure that it remain open for us, not that it be a source of profit. America's initial investment has already been repaid many times over as our economy and our nation have grown.

Second, payments for Panama will come from the tolls charged, not from the American taxpayer. No new congressional appropriations are required. From 1914 to 1977 the tolls have increased only from $1.20 to $1.29 per Panama Canal ton. A 20 to 25 per cent increase in tolls is obviously inevitable and justifiable.

Third, increased tolls will have little if any effect on the American economy. The canal itself is obsolete for our larger vessels. Only about 4 to 7 per cent of our trade goes through the canal. The mechanism of the market is the best protection against future unreasonable rates; Panama wants to attract canal traffic, not discourage it. As someone has noted, if the canal were to close for any reason—sabotage, mismanagement, disaster or whatever—America's economy would hardly feel a tremor while Panama's would experience "an earthquake of a proportion no Richter scale could measure."

Fourth, Panama will receive increased loans from the United States, all to be repaid with interest. Apart from the treaties, America has agreed to stimulate further the national development of Panama by providing assistance via four international programs already existing and requiring no new funding. In the next five years Panama will get approximately $295 million, all in loans to be repaid with interest. Along with making available military credits totaling $50 million over a ten-year period, the purpose is to help Panama be more self-sufficient.

Fifth, it should be noted that it is Panama that could justify crying "rip-off" over all these years. The $2.3 million received annually by Panama's 1.5 million people from the tolls for the use of the canal and Zone amounts to about $6 per acre—hardly a fair price, especially when we remember that America pays rent to its allies around the world for the use of land for military purposes. Spain is getting $685 million during a five-year period; Greece, $700 million for four years. Turkey and the Philippines have been talking in terms of $1 billion for four years. What Panama will receive under the new treaties seems small indeed, when compared with other arrangements, the value of the canal, and the fact that the U.S. will continue to operate at least eight military bases there.

THE BEST DEFENSE

3. "Isn't America's national security endangered by these treaties?" Critics say that the "communists" may take over the canal; during war our enemies will use it; the Panamanians will sabotage it; Torrijos is pro-Marxist and can't be trusted.

The primary way to address these concerns is to point out that America's top military leaders unanimously support the new treaties. Prior approval was received from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Department of Defense before any provisions were inserted in the treaties. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs, General George S. Brown, asserts: "Our capability to defend the Panama Canal will be enhanced through cooperation with the government of Panama. I have personally worked very diligently for four years to achieve these treaties. We have worked hard for these treaties because we feel they are right." Apparently nothing angers the chiefs more than the claims of opponents that they really don't favor the treaties but must follow Carter's line. (Don't forget that these men advocated the B-1 bomber, though Carter opposed it.) For conservative senators to impugn the integrity of generals is really a switch!

Knowledgeable Panamanian observers report that communism has no popular base of support in that country and that Torrijos is no Marxist. Ratification would take away the most compelling communist argument: that America will not peacefully turn over the canal and Zone. Further, Panama could not invite Cuba or Russia to operate the canal or to establish military bases, since the Panama Canal Treaty provides that the U.S. can be the only foreign power with military bases in Panama until year 2000. After that date, the Neutrality Treaty specifies that only Panama can operate the canal and maintain military bases within its border. If neutrality is threatened, America can intervene militarily.

Fears that enemy warships would benefit from these "neutrality" provisions are not shared by America's military leaders. During World War II, Germany and Japan technically could have used the canal. According to Navy Secretary W. Graham Claytor, Jr., if an enemy ship tried using the canal during war, it would be destroyed before it got within three miles of the entrance. If somehow it got to the canal, the U.S. would carefully ensure its passage—then blow it up three miles out to sea!

What alarms American military leaders is not external threat but internal sabotage. Probably the canal is defensible, but General Brown predicts that it would take 100,000 troops to fight in a jungle environment worse than Vietnam. Even if General Torrijos or his successor wanted to avoid violence and sabotage, "Yankee colonialism" is so deeply resented that the war would be endless as guerrilla fighters would come from all of Latin America. As Henry Kissinger told that grass-roots gathering in Washington, D.C.: "Whatever we think, the 1903 treaty is not viewed anywhere in the world as equitable and just. We wouldn't stand a similar arrangement in our country."

Failure to ratify could have grave ramifications. Ratification would be the best defense, drastically reducing anti-Americanism in the hemisphere and making Panamanians responsible for operating and defending their own major economic resource.

AMERICAN IDEALS

4. "Shouldn't the United States quit retreating and take a strong stand in Panama?" This "spirit of America" question emphasizes America's need to show the world who's boss and the importance of not yielding to blackmail or negotiating under duress. Underneath is a fear that Panama will not stick to the terms of the treaties.

Many main-street Americans see the Panama treaties as evidence of this country's weakness abroad. Actually, the opposite can be argued; it is evidence of a nation's greatness when it can live in peace and partnership with its neighbors. Gunboat-diplomacy days are long gone; the U.S. promotes the self-determination and development of nations, unlike the communists in eastern Europe who continue to practice a form of colonialism.

The treaty negotiations went on for 13 years; the Panamanians displayed more patience than pressure. During this period no violence or sabotage occurred, though our military leaders say that sabotage would not have been difficult. It is said, for example, that a worker's lunchpail could hold enough explosives to create a sudden break in a dam or lock system; it would require two years' time for the system to refill with water. No one can be sure that Panama won't try to abrogate these treaties at a later date. Unlike the 1903 pact, however, these documents were negotiated freely without the pressures of time, conflict or gunboat diplomacy. Since they were freely agreed to and signed in the presence of almost all the western hemispheric leaders, they have a political, moral and legal force that was lacking in 1903.

Furthermore, on October 23, 1977, in a free election, the Panamanians by a two-thirds vote supported these treaties. The one-third who voted against the treaties represent various political positions, but according to two American election observers, there is "near national unanimity that the time has come for Panama to begin taking responsibility for the Canal" (unpublished "Article on Panama Plebiscite," by Donald G. Herzberg and Timothy S. Healy, Georgetown University).

The U.S. got what it wanted out of the new treaties: an open, neutral, accessible canal—just what we have now. The "spirit of America" is best expressed when we act according to our ideals, demonstrating that America is strong and self-confident enough to act with fairness and justice toward smaller countries.

For many, John Wayne epitomizes America's patriotism, if not its "macho" pride. On Main Street, where treaty support is often thought to be limited to "bleeding heart liberals," it is sometimes effective to respond to emotion by quoting one of Middle America's heroes. The "Duke" has said:

I have carefully studied the treaties, and I support them on the basis of my belief that America always looks to the future and that our people have demonstrated qualities of justice and reason for 200 years. That attitude has made our country a great nation. The new treaties modernize an outmoded relationship with a friendly and hospitable country. They also solve an international question with our other Latin American neighbors. Finally, the treaties protect and legitimize fundamental interests of our country" ["Treaty Support From—Yes—"The Duke," Washington Post, October 25, 1977].

A TIME TO ACT

Ratification of the treaties is endangered by an "unholy trinity" of forces. A right-wing opposition campaign is clear-cut and well-financed, with full-time staff working in some states. From these opponents people who speak out for the treaties can expect pressure, mailings and even "labeling." The second force is the left wing, much less vocal and surely less organized. This group regards the treaties as being much too pro-American, manifesting an updated style of military colonialism designed to protect this country's economic and political domination of Panama and the region.

Completing this "unholy trinity" are the apathetic Americans who have not taken a thoughtful public stance. Until recently I could be counted in this category—basically supportive but with some questions and reservations, not raising my voice in public or writing to my senators and local editors. Conscientious but puzzled main-street Americans are not getting help from local leaders. This widespread apathy could lead not only to rejection of the treaties but to a strengthening of the "new right" in American politics, the defeat of some outstanding political leaders of both parties in the 1978 elections, and an undermining of the president's ability to conduct an effective foreign policy.

Some "wild tongues" are at work on main-street middle America, and we need to hear again Franklin Littell's warning: "At the last judgment the balcony-sitter may plead, 'I never harmed a fly.' But the Judge will say, 'The fly that you never harmed carried the plague to million'" (Wild Tongues: A Handbook of Social Pathology [Macmillan, 1969], p. 125). Now is the time for each of us to speak out for the treaties, acting preventively for peace to avoid a "plague" of violence and war for millions in the western hemisphere.

Better yet would be for America to act not out of fear of coming catastrophe, but out of a higher patriotism and idealism that reflect the goodness of our people and our commitment to international justice.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a joint statement concerning jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation in the Panama Canal matter.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT OF SENATORS HOWARD W. CANNON AND JAMES B. PEARSON RE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION JURISDICTION OVER THE PANAMA CANAL

As Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, we would like to clarify for the record the jurisdiction of the Committee over the Panama Canal on the eve of the Senate's consideration of new treaties with the Republic of Panama which will determine the future of the Canal.

Under Rule XXV, Section 1(f) (1) 12 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Commerce Committee has jurisdiction over "all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials and other matters relating to the * * * "Panama Canal and interoceanic canals generally, except as provided in subparagraph (c)."

Under Subparagraph (c) of Rule XXV, Section 1, the Committee on Armed Services has jurisdiction over all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials and other matters relating to the "maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, including administration, sanitation and government of the Canal Zone."

Although the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation does not assert specific jurisdiction over the particular treaties which are now before the Senate, the Committee has followed their consideration by both the Foreign Relations Committee and Armed Services Committee through its own Members' participation on those Committees, and will discharge its jurisdictional responsibilities as future developments may require, including a careful review of any legislation proposed to implement the treaties.

A COMPARISON OF U.S. INTERESTS WITH OUR PRESENT STATUS AND WITH THE GOAL OF THE PANAMA TREATIES—PART I: THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the full magnitude of the impact of the Panama Canal Treaty does not become clear until one studies the treaty, line by line, and compares it with our present status. Those who support the treaty assert that our present status has become untenable as a result of discontent among the Panamanian people. In itself, such an assertion is a judgment about future events. It may be valid and it may not. It cannot be proven. It is only a judgment.

Our task here, therefore, is to examine such judgments. They must be compared with another judgment: Whether the treaty, along with the Neutrality Treaty, will provide the basis for a sound working relationship with the Panamanian people. In other words, we must judge the treaty not only against our present status, but also against the goals proclaimed by the negotiators of the treaty itself.

In order to assist Senators in this task, I have prepared a side-by-side analysis presenting the text of the treaty, the way it changes our present status, and the way in which the treaty measures up to its own goals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this analysis be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A COMPARISON OF U.S. INTERESTS WITH OUR PRESENT STATUS AND WITH THE GOAL OF THE TREATIES—PART I:
THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

(By Senator Jesse Helms)

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

PRESERVATION OF U.S. INTEREST AS JUDGED BY 1903 TREATY

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama,

Acting in the spirit of the Joint Declaration of April 3, 1964, by the Representatives of the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, and of the Joint Statement of Principles of February 7, 1974, initiated by the Secretary of State of the United States of America and the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Panama, and Acknowledging the Republic of Panama's sovereignty over its territory,

Have decided to terminate the prior Treaties pertaining to the Panama Canal and to conclude a new Treaty to serve as the basis for a new relationship between them and, accordingly, have agreed upon the following:

Article I

Abrogation of prior treaties and establishment of a new relationship

1. Upon its entry into force, this Treaty terminates and supersedes:
 - (a) The Isthmian Canal Convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, signed at Washington, November 18, 1903;

PRESERVATION OF U.S. INTEREST AS JUDGED BY ASSUMPTION THAT CANAL SHOULD BE GIVEN TO PANAMA

Bilateral action fails to recognize the deep and vital interests of other Latin American nations and Canal users.

Neither document has any validity as the basis for the disposal of U.S. territory and property under Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution, which requires Congress to authorize such disposal. The Joint Statement of February 7, 1974, was not submitted to Congress.

The phrase "Panama's sovereignty over its territory" implies that all previous legislative enactments relating to the Canal Zone were illegal and opens the door to chaotic claims, e.g., Panama's present assertions that all those ever born in the Canal Zone are Panamanians, or at least "dual citizens" subject to Panamanian law. This last claim would apply to about 25% of the present U.S. work force and to about 80-90% of their children.

Article I

1. By implication, all of the jurisdiction which Panama receives under this treaty will be jurisdiction over U.S. territory, since the treaty fails to make explicit transfer of the U.S. territory involved.

through Panama territory, i.e., outside the Zone.

(b) The Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation signed at Washington, March 2, 1936, and the Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation and the related Memorandum of Understandings Reached, signed at Panama, January 25, 1955, between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama;

(c) All other treaties, conventions, agreements and exchanges of notes between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama concerning the Panama Canal which were in force prior to the entry into force of this Treaty; and

(d) Provisions concerning the Panama Canal which appear in other treaties, conventions, agreements and exchanges of notes between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama which were in force prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

2. In accordance with the terms of this Treaty and related agreements, the Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America, for the duration of this Treaty, the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the Canal. The Republic of Panama guarantees to the United States of America the peaceful use of the land and water areas which it has been granted the rights to use for such purposes pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements.

3. The Republic of Panama shall participate increasingly in the management and protection and defense of the Canal, as provided in this Treaty.

(d) Each of these other treaties, conventions, agreements, and exchanges of notes should be examined to judge whether U.S. interests are degraded.

2. This clause sidesteps the question of ownership and grants the U.S. the "use" of what we already own. Thus the Canal is effectively "nationalized" by Panama on Day One of the treaty. This clause effectively converts the rest of the treaty into a management contract. The phrase "peaceful use" effectively cuts us off from any military uses not directly specified below as related to the defense of the Canal (e.g., hemispheric defense, use of Isthmian installations as an advance base for refueling and resupply of worldwide military operations).

3. It is noteworthy that this clause calls not for the participation by Panamanian citizens, but for the participation of the Republic of Panama, e.g., government-to-government participation.

2. Since the Canal Zone is U.S. territory, we already have these rights and the treaty is unnecessary.

3. Panamanians have already been increasingly participating in the management and protection, but not the defense of the Canal.

4. In view of the special relationship established by this Treaty, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall cooperate to assure the uninterrupted and efficient operation of the Panama Canal.

Article II

Ratification, entry into force, and termination

1. This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

2. This treaty shall terminate at noon, Panama time, December 31, 1999.

Article III

Canal operation and management

1. The Republic of Panama, as territorial sovereign, grants to the United States of America the rights to manage, operate, and

4. Although this clause is unenforceable, it points up the political threat that lack of Panamanian governmental cooperation under the new treaty has the potential to close the Canal.

Article II

1. The Constitutional procedures of the United States require that the House of Representatives authorize the disposal of U.S. territory and property before the instruments of ratification are exchanged.

It is noteworthy that all the restrictions of the Neutrality treaty, preventing us from using the Canal or our military bases for non-neutral purposes, go into effect on Day One, not at the year 2000, as many have assumed.

Article III

1. Note once again that this is a management contract; the United States agrees not to exercise its rights in any other fashion.

maintain the Panama Canal, its complementary works, installations and equipment and to provide for the orderly transit of vessels through the Panama Canal. The United States of America accepts the grant of such rights and undertakes to exercise them in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

2. In carrying out the foregoing responsibilities, the United States of America may:

(a) Use for the aforementioned purposes, without cost except as provided in this Treaty, the various installations and areas (including the Panama Canal) and waters, described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date, as well as such other areas and installations as are made available to the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements, and take the measures necessary to ensure sanitation of such areas;

(b) Make such improvements and alterations to the aforesaid installations and areas as it deems appropriate, consistent with the terms of this Treaty;

(c) Make and enforce all rules pertaining to the passage of vessels through the Canal and other rules with respect to navigation and maritime matters, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules;

(d) Establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment;

(e) Regulate relations with employees of the United States Government;

(f) Provide supporting services to facilitate

2. All construction in the Canal Zone was undertaken on the assumption that the U.S. had valid titles in perpetuity. The 1907 case of Wilson v. Shaw was a challenge to this very point; the Court ruled that in the Government's favor.

2. (a) The U.S. may use without cost (1) the various installations which the U.S. built and which the U.S. owns.

The Agreement in Implementation is not a part of the treaty; it is an executive agreement outside the reach of Senate consideration—yet it describes the use rights of the United States which make the treaty meaningful.

"Sanitation" has a different meaning in the Canal Zone than it does in the continental United States. Here it means primarily the mosquito control program, which includes swamp controls, drainage of standing water, and removal and clipping of vegetation. Since the Panama Canal Commission will lose 58% of the area the U.S. now sanitates, failure by Panama to sanitize could lose the Canal by disease.

the performance of its responsibilities under this Article;

(g) Issue and enforce regulations for the effective exercise of the rights and responsibilities of the United States of America under this Treaty and related agreements. The Republic of Panama will lend its cooperation, when necessary, in the enforcement of such rules; and

(h) Exercise any other right granted under this Treaty, or otherwise agreed upon between the two Parties.

3. Pursuant to the foregoing grant of rights, the United States of America shall, in accordance with the terms of this Treaty and the provisions of United States law, carry out its responsibilities by means of United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America.

(a) The Panama Canal Commission shall be supervised by a Board composed of nine members, five of whom shall be nationals of the United States of America, and four of whom shall be Panamanian nationals proposed by the Republic of Panama for appoint-

3. The U.S., at present, has sole control over all aspects of Canal management.

3. The treaty is an intrusion upon the rights of the Legislative Branch, since it creates an international obligation on the Congress of the United States to pass a law that conforms to the treaty terms. Should Congress create an agency with a different structure, or should the House of Representatives refuse to act, the United States would default on its obligations. Just as with the House action required under Article IV, Section 3, so too ratification of the treaty should be contingent upon enactment of the necessary implementing legislation.

(a) The Department of State has been unable to cite any precedent for a joint Board of U.S. and foreign nationals supervising a U.S. agency. The treaty fails to make it clear that the members of the Board, including the Panamanian nationals, should be confirmed ment to such positions by the United States of America in a timely manner.

(b) Should the Republic of Panama request the United States of America to remove a Panamanian national from membership on the Board, the United States of America shall agree to such request. In that event, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America to such position in a timely manner. In case of removal of a Panamanian member of the Board at the initiative of the United States of America, both Parties will consult in advance in order to reach agreement concerning such removal, and the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment by the United States of America in his stead.

(c) The United States of America shall employ a national of the United States of America as Administrator of the Panama Canal Commission, and a Panamanian national as Deputy Administrator, through December 31, 1989. Beginning January 1, 1990, a Panamanian national shall be employed as the Administrator and a national of the United States of America shall occupy the position as Deputy Administrator. Such Panamanian nationals shall be proposed to the United States of America by the Republic of Panama for appointment to such positions by the United States of America.

by the Senate for the protection of U.S. interests.

Provisions for a voting quorum on the Board are omitted from the treaty, and, if unilaterally proclaimed by the United States in favor of the U.S. majority, will become a cause of discontent and friction.

(b) This provision ensures that all the Panamanian representatives will be puppets of the Panamanian government. Any Panamanian representative whose statements or actions supported good management practice in defiance of Panamanian political interests would be removed. In the event of a revolution or a communist takeover, the Panamanian representatives would change accordingly. The U.S. will not be able to remove any Panamanian without advance consultation. The obligations inherent in consultation are nowhere defined. Note that the U.S. and Panama must "reach agreement" concerning such removal.

(c) The Administrator is the only instrument for enforcing the decisions of the voting majority of the Board. Because of the excessive drawdown of U.S. citizen employees, (43 percent in the first year, 48.5 percent in three years), the post quickly will become one of mere tokenism, perhaps within 5 years or sooner. By that time, the United States will have lost practical control of operations. When the U.S. Deputy Administrator takes over in 1990, he will be completely powerless.

Both the Administrator and the Deputy Administrator should be confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

(d) Should the United States of America remove the Panamanian national from his position as Deputy Administrator, or Administrator, the Republic of Panama shall propose another Panamanian national for appointment to such position by the United States of America.

4. An illustrative description of the activities the Panama Canal Commission will perform in carrying out the responsibilities and rights of the United States of America under this Article is set forth at the Annex. Also set forth in the Annex are procedures for the discontinuance or transfer of those activities performed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty by the Panama Canal Company or the Canal Zone Government which are not to be carried out by the Panama Canal Commission.

4. The activities divested provide $142,000,000 in annual revenues (FY '79), or 69 percent of the non-toll revenues (35.6 percent of all revenues). Although some of these operations lose money, others are very profitable and help subsidize overall operations. The divestiture will also remove 43 percent of U.S. employees the first year. Although some will be transferred, the fate of many, perhaps most, is uncertain.

4. It is unlikely that the most profitable services (e.g., marine bunkering) will be taken over by private businessmen with close ties to the regime. Others will become Panamanian government agencies. While private business management in Panama can be considered adequate, the potential for abuses, corruption, and political exploitation is obvious. Panamanian governmental services are notoriously mismanaged, wasteful, and inefficient. It is noteworthy that no preplanning has been done for the transfer of $142,000,000 worth of services, which will have considerable impact in a small economy. The wholesale shuffling of thousands of employees will have a detrimental effect on worker productivity throughout the Panama Canal Commission and the Panamanian economy.

5. The Panama Canal Company has estimated that the cost to Panama of providing the services for which the U.S. will pay $10 million per year is only $4.4 million primarily because of the lower wage levels Panama pays. The difference ($6.6 million per year) is

5. Under the 1903 treaty, similar services were originally provided by the U.S. to the Panamanian cities of Colon and Panama City. When, at Panama's request, these obligations were abrogated, Panama's inability to provide the same levels of quality and

5. The Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama for the costs incurred by the Republic of Panama in providing the following public services in the Canal operating areas and in housing areas set forth in the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty and occupied by both United States and Panamanian citizens: police, fire protection, street maintenance, street lighting, street cleaning, traffic management and garbage collection. The Panama Canal Commission shall pay the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per annum for the foregoing services. It is agreed that every three years from the date that this Treaty enters into force, the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services.

6. The Republic of Panama shall be responsible for providing, in all areas comprising the former Canal Zone, services of a general jurisdictional nature such as customs and immigration, postal services, courts and licensing, in accordance with this Treaty and related agreements.

delivery soon became notorious. Even today, garbage collection in Panama is seriously mismanaged, and utility rates are three times what they are in the Zone (where all costs are recovered). Perhaps that is why, under implementation plans prepared by the Panama Canal Company, the U.S. will duplicate many of the services purchased under this clause. For example, the U.S. will continue to operate 11 of its 13 fire stations.

6. These services are currently performed by the U.S. according to U.S. standards and law. The U.S. District Court at Balboa was established pursuant to Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution and is part of the U.S. Federal Court System.

a hidden subsidy to Panama. Although in theory one might argue that the fee could be adjusted downward, as well as upward, the context ("inflation and other relevant factors") implies an upward adjustment. Moreover, there is no definition of "cost of such services", an issue open to misunderstanding and resentment.

6. A major portion of the U.S. District Court's docket (60 or 70 cases per year) involves cases at admiralty (e.g., ships' claims involving accidents or damage) often with awards running into millions of dollars. Panama has no admiralty courts, no admiralty law, and does not subscribe to the International Admiralty Convention. Its standards of impartial justice are low. The transfer of customs, immigration, and courts for the major ports to Panamanian control has ominous implications for control of the narcotics traffic, inasmuch as Panama is a major transfer center for narcotics shipment to the U.S., apparently with the sanction and participation of the Torrijos family.

With Panama controlling the police the customs and the courts the actual words of the treaty will mean less than the way Panama enforces and interprets its will.

7. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Panama Canal Consultative Committee, composed of an equal number of high-level representatives of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, and which may appoint such subcommittees as it may deem appropriate. This Committee shall advise the United States of America and the Republic of Panama on matters of policy affecting the Canal's operation. In view of both Parties' special interest in the continuity and efficiency of the Canal operation in the future, the Committee shall advise on matters such as general tolls policy, employment and training policies to increase the participation of Panamanian nationals in the operation of the Canal, and international policies on matters concerning the Canal. The Committee's recommendations shall be transmitted to the two Governments, which shall give such recommendations full consideration in the formulation of such policy decisions.

8. In addition to the participation of Panamanian nationals at high management levels of the Panama Canal Commission, as provided for in paragraph 3 of this Article, there shall be growing participation of Panamanian nationals at all other levels and areas of employment in the aforesaid commission, with the objective of preparing, in an orderly and efficient fashion, for the assumption by

7. The impact of such consultation and advice particularly with the U.S. obligation of giving "full consideration" is difficult to conceive in advance. Presumably, when the national interests differ the U.S. will argue that it has given "full consideration" while Panama would argue that we have not. The three alternatives are capitulation, concession or confrontation. In practice, the Consultative Commission will become a battleground for psychological warfare resulting in Panama imposing its will on the United States. Note that the Committee "shall advise" even though the U.S. in Section 1 is supposed to make "all rules" pertaining to maritime matters. Panama is given a significant role.

8. It should be noted that increasing Panamanian participation does not mean that more Panamanians will benefit from the high wages (three times Panamanian wage rates), stability, lack of political interference, and retirement benefits that is available to U.S. government workers. In actuality, fewer Panamanians will be employed in the Canal operation.

9. The use of the areas, waters and installations with respect to which the United States of America is granted rights pursuant to this Article, and the rights and legal status of United States Government agencies and employees operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Article, shall be governed by the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date.

10. Upon entry into force of this Treaty, the United States Government agencies known as the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the territory of the Republic of Panama that formerly constituted the Canal Zone.

9. We not only "use" these areas at present, but we also sanitize them, and prevent development which would destroy the ecological balance. The undeveloped jungle canopy in the Canal Zone attracts 20% more rainfall than the rest of Panama, rainfall which is essential to an adequate water supply to operate the locks. It also prevents siltation and runoff which would pollute the Chagres River, Madden Dam and Lake, and Gatun Lake, and the Canal itself. The Panama Canal Commission will give over to Panamanian control 58% of the land area it presently owns and protects.

10. The Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone government were created by Congress through the Panama Canal Reorganization Act of 1950.

9. The Implementation Agreement as noted above is an executive agreement not part of the treaty and beyond the reach of Senate action. In addition, the Implementation Agreement includes three detailed annexes, and "agreed Minute to the Agreement", and a detailed set of 29 maps deposited in the Archives of the Department of State. Reference to the maps reveals that many vital installations (schools, drinking water reservoirs, dams, electrical plants, communications sites) are not contiguous with the main areas and will be left isolated deep in Panamanian territory.

10. The Executive Branch is attempting to abrogate Congressional authority which has been continuously exercised under Article IV, Section 3, since 1902 (The Spooner Act), and specifically in this case, since 1950.

Article IV

Protection and defense

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal. Each Party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it.

2. For the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. The rights of the United States of America to station, train, and move military forces within the Republic of Panama are described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date. The use of areas and installations and the legal status of the armed forces of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall be governed by the aforesaid Agreement.

Article IV

1. The U.S. defends the Canal on the same basis as other U.S. territories. The U.S. may also use the territory for any military mission it chooses, whether directly related to defense of the Canal itself or not. In defending the Canal Zone, the U.S. enjoys the advantages of a clearly defined land and water area, so that its military operations need not impinge on Panamanian sovereignty and territory, unless attacked from Panama.

PRESERVATION OF U.S. INTEREST AS JUDGED BY PANAMA

Article IV

1. The treaty is deeply ambiguous on the crucial point, namely, the right to take unilateral defense actions even if Panama is unable or unwilling. The concept that Panama, by herself, has any capability to defend the Canal is ridiculous; but nothing in the treaty prohibits Panama from calling in the troops of other nations to defend her sovereignty against the U.S. or even to fulfill her obligation here expressed to defend the Canal. This language contrasts with the clear, direct, right of unilateral decision expressed in the Clements clause: "each Party shall take such other diplomatic, economic, or military measures as it deems necessary."

2. "Primary responsibility" is nowhere defined and later seems to be modified by "equal" roles on the Combined Board. Nor is the U.S. given authority to carry out its responsibility. The U.S. military bases and vital Canal installations are not contiguous, yet the treaty itself gives no authority to move from one to the other if military operations are necessary. The rights of movement are not described in the treaty, but only in the Implementation Agreement, an executive agreement beyond the review of the Senate. The description of those rights is in the context of freedom from fees and licenses for vehicles, and makes no mention of military operations or movement of ground troops.

3. The Combined Board falls under the same criticism as the Consultative Committee; namely it is a mechanism through which Panama can conduct psychological warfare against the U.S. Under this language, Panama has the right to be privy to all battle plans for Canal defense, even if Panama or Panamanian allies are the "enemy". The difference between "coordination" and "cooperation" is not spelled out, but note that the Combined Board "shall" provide for both. Paragraph (a) can be taken in two opposite senses: (1) The Board is responsible only for those contingency plans based on cooperative effort; or (2) all contingency plans for the defense of the Canal are required by treaty to be based upon cooperative effort—that is, the U.S. is forbidden to have contingency plans which exclude Panama. A similar ambiguity exists in paragraph (c), for it is not clear whether "United States and Panamanian military operations" are joint or could be separate. This paragraph goes beyond mere cooperation and planning and specifically involves "conduct", where Panama is given an "equal" role. The implication is clearly that Panama must be involved in everything; and that if the U.S. conducts operations without Panama or in opposition to Panama's wishes, it would be a violation of the treaty.

4. This clause is a mechanism by which Panama can protest the exercise of the U.S. right to set troop levels under Section 5.

3. In order to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the armed forces of both Parties in the protection and defense of the Canal, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Combined Board comprised of an equal number of senior military representatives of each Party. These representatives shall be charged by their respective governments with consulting and cooperating on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the Canal, and with planning for actions to be taken in concert for that purpose. Such combined protection and defense arrangements shall not inhibit the identity or lines of authority of the armed forces of the United States of America or the Republic of Panama. The Combined Board shall provide for coordination and cooperation concerning such matters as:

(a) The preparation of contingency plans for the protection and defense of the Canal based upon the cooperative efforts of the armed forces of both Parties;

(b) The planning and conduct of combined military exercises; and

(c) The conduct of United States and Panamanian military operations with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

4. The Combined Board shall, at five year intervals throughout the duration of this Treaty, review the resources being made available by the two Parties for the protection and defense of the Canal. Also, the Combined Board shall make appropriate recommendations to the two Governments respecting projected requirements, the efficient utilization of available resources of the two Parties, and other matters of mutual interest with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

5. To the extent possible consistent with its primary responsibility for the protection and defense of the Panama Canal, the United States of America will endeavor to maintain its armed forces in the Republic of Panama in normal times at a level not in excess of that of the armed forces of the United States of America in the territory of the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

5. This section sets a maximum, not a minimum level; the U.S. would be under enormous pressure from the mechanism of Section 4 to reduce force levels constantly. Even if a danger threatened, there is not definition of "normal times". If Panama or her allies were threatening the Canal, in our view, Panama might claim treaty violations if we reinforced our troop levels.

Article V

Principle of non-intervention

Employees of the Panama Canal Commission, their dependents and designated contractors of the Panama Canal Commission, who are nationals of the United States of America, shall respect the laws of the Republic of Panama and shall abstain from any activity incompatible with the spirit of this Treaty. Accordingly they shall abstain from any political activity in the Republic of Panama as well as from any intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama. The United States of America shall take all

Article V

At the present time, U.S. citizens who enter the Republic of Panama are obliged to follow the laws of that country. In the Canal Zone, they are protected by the laws of the United States, the Canal Zone code, and the Bill of Rights. The treaty is equivalent to a conspiracy to deprive U.S. citizens living in U.S. territory of their civil and constitutional rights. The experience of U.S. citizens with Panamanian courts and the guardia has been very poor, with numerous bombings, deprivation of right to counsel and even of the right to

Article V

Article V amounts to a bill of attainer against U.S. citizen employees who, in Panama's judgment, fail to 'abstain from any activity incompatible with the spirit of this treaty.' Such a catch-all phrase is open to any interpretation and is designed to intimidate U.S. citizens. "Any political activity" obviously could even include a U.S. citizen writing to his Senator or Congressman, or exposing graft and corruption within the Panama Canal Commission, its suppliers, or allied Panamanian agencies. The phrase "in-measures within its authority to ensure that the provisions of this Article are fulfilled.

Article VI Protection of the environment

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to implement this Treaty in a manner consistent with the protection of the natural environment of the Republic of Panama. To this end, they shall consult and cooperate with each other in all appropriate ways to ensure that they shall give due regard to the protection and conservation of the environment.

contact the U.S. Embassy. The State Department has admitted that Panama has violated on numerous occasions treaties intended to protect the rights of U.S. citizens, e.g., the right of unimpeded entrance and egress through Tocumen Airport, according to an agreement signed when the U.S., at Panama's request, ended its air passenger service from the Zone.

Article VI

1. As mentioned above, the ecological balance of the Zone is very delicate, and is crucial to the continued troublefree operation of the Canal. Indeed, the Panama Canal is probably the first large-scale project in the world which, for 75 years, has practiced effective environmental controls of great complexity. Certainly Panama has never managed controls on such a scale; rather, Panama has failed to cooperate (e.g., in removing squatters who have intruded on the eco-zone) and has practiced destructive development in the exploitation of jungle areas (e.g., slash and burn agriculture). The Commission will lose 58% of the land it now protects; the treaty should enlarge that area to include the whole Chagres River watershed, not diminish it.

It is also noteworthy that, in ceding the Zone to Panama, the U.S. will lose the only U.S. National Forest with tropical flora and fauna.

tervention in the internal affairs of Panama" is a current code word regularly used today in Panama to harass U.S. citizens, and arrest them without charges. The requirement that the U.S. government conspire with Panama to deprive a U.S. citizen of his rights (e.g., by firing an outspoken U.S. citizen employee) is probably unconstitutional on its face. Even if Panama were not a dictatorship, Article V would be a blot upon the civil rights record of the United States.

Article VI

1. There are few grounds to expect that environmental controls will be improved rather than degraded. The negotiations completely ignored the environmental considerations until the last minute. The State Department, in violation of law, filed its first hastily assembled draft environmental impact statement after the negotiations were completed, not before. The final EIS is woefully inadequate.

2. A Joint Commission on the Environment shall be established with equal representation from the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, which shall periodically review the implementation of this Treaty and shall recommend as appropriate to the two Governments ways to avoid or, should this not be possible, to mitigate the adverse environmental impacts which might result from their respective actions pursuant to the Treaty.

2. The Commission on the Environment, like the Consultative Committee and the Combined (Defense) Board, is a mechanism by which Panama can protest and intervene in nearly any operating decision of the Panama Canal Commission or of our military bases.

3. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall furnish the Joint Commission on the Environment complete information on any action taken in accordance with this Treaty which, in the judgment of both, might have a significant effect on the environment. Such information shall be made available to the Commission as far in advance of the contemplated action as possible to facilitate the study by the Commission of any potential environmental problems and to allow for consideration of the recommendation of the Commission before the contemplated action is carried out.

Article VII

1. The entire territory of the Republic of Panama, including the areas the use of which the Republic of Panama makes available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, shall be under the flag of the Republic of Panama, and consequently such flag always shall occupy the position of honor.

2. The flag of the United States of America may be displayed, together with the flag of the Republic of Panama, at the headquarters of the Panama Canal Commission, at the site of the Combined Board, and as provided in the Agreement in Implementation of Article IV of this Treaty.

3. The flag of the United States of America also may be displayed at other places and on some occasions, as agreed by both Parties.

Article VIII

Privileges and immunities

1. The installations owned or used by the agencies or instrumentalities of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, and their official archives and documents, shall be inviolable. The two Parties shall agree on procedures to be followed in the conduct of any criminal investigation at such locations by the Republic of Panama.

2. Agencies and instrumentalities of the Government of the United States of America operating in the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements shall be immune from the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama.

sure. Obviously, it is totally unnecessary if the territory is ceded to Panama, a mere administrative detail. Yet the concession by President Kennedy to allow the Panamanian flag to fly with equal honor on U.S. territory in designated places merely inflamed Panamanian nationalists, symbolically undermined our presence (although no legal concessions were made), and was the formal cause of the riots of 1964, described by Ambassador Bunker and Joseph Califano as Communist organized. Although though the U.S. was exonerated by the International Commission of Jurists of any culpability with regard to the riots and the restoration of order, the events nevertheless were the occasion of opening the negotiations by President Johnson.

Article VIII

1. Although the installations will be inviolable, the personnel will not. After the transition period and even during it for some crimes, U.S. personnel will be subject to Panamanian jurisdiction. This is obvious in the clause on agreeing to procedure for criminal investigations to take place on the "inviolable" premises.

2. The same is true for agencies of the U.S. government. If the agencies themselves are unreachable, a Panama intent to harass could act against the agencies by acting against the personnel. Moreover, there is a conflict with Article IX, which appears to apply Panamanian law to U.S. areas of use.

3. In addition to such other privileges and immunities as are afforded to employees of the United States Government and their dependents pursuant to this Treaty, the United States of America may designate up to twenty officials of the Panama Canal Commission who, along with their dependents, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded to diplomatic agents and their dependents under international law and practice. The United States of America shall furnish to the Republic of Panama a list of the names of said officials and their dependents, identifying the positions they occupy in the Government of the United States of America, and shall keep such list current at all times.

3. If diplomatic immunity is a necessity for the 20 key employees of the Panama Canal Commission, then it is a necessity for all U.S. citizen employees and their dependents. In fact, it is even more important for lower level employees who have less public visibility and are thus more easily harassed. The burden would not be great on Panama. Even if all present employees were given diplomatic immunity, the proportions of those immune to the population of Panama would be less than the proportion of those with diplomatic immunity in Washington, D.C. to the area population. But of course half the U.S. citizens will lose their jobs with the Commission anyway. Without immunity, it will be difficult to get U.S. citizens to stay long enough even for training Panamanians to take their places.

Article IX

Applicable laws and law enforcement

1. In accordance with the provisions of this Treaty and related agreements, the law of the Republic of Panama shall apply in the areas made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty. specifically provided in prior treaties and agreements.

2. Natural or juridical persons who, on the date of entry into force of this Treaty, are engaged in business or non-profit activities at locations in the former Canal Zone may continue such business or activities at those locations under the same terms and conditions prevailing prior to the entry into force of this Treaty for a thirty-month transition period from its entry into force. The Republic of Panama shall maintain the same operating conditions as those applicable to the aforementioned enterprises prior to the entry into force of this Treaty in order that they may receive licenses to do business in the Republic of Panama subject to their compliance with the requirements of its law. Thereafter, such persons shall receive the same treatment under the law of the Republic of Panama as similar enterprises already established in the rest of the territory of the Republic of Panama without discrimination.

3. The rights of ownership, as recognized by the United States of America, enjoyed by natural or juridical private persons in buildings and other improvements to real property located in the former Canal Zone shall be recognized by the Republic of Panama in conformity with its laws.

4. With respect to buildings and other improvements to real property located in the Canal operating areas, housing areas or other areas subject to the licensing procedure established in Article IV of the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty, the owners shall be authorized to continue ture for the Zone, since the Zone is an unincorporated U.S. territory under Article IV, Section 3.

Law enforcement is based on a highly trained professional police corps, entirely separate from the military. In the Canal Zone, there are clean jails and a modern penitentiary where prisoners are held for up to six months and then transferred to Federal Penitentiaries in the United States. There is an excellent system of probations and parole.

trials, except for homicide. In such cases, there is provision for a seven-man jury, but no right of challenge in selection, as in the U.S. In Panama there are no civil jury trials, and all cases are taken by deposition, so that there is no opportunity of confronting or cross-examination of witnesses. Criminal and civil liability in actions in tort are interlocked, so that there is no civil liability without criminal liability.

The police system in Panama is part of the military organization, the National Guard. There is no separate constabulary, no city police, no sheriffs. Each member of the Guardia has full powers of arrest. It is, in short, a full military dictatorship.

Panamanian penal institutions are deplorable. They are dirty, crowded, and serve bad food. There is little opportunity for bail or probation. Many persons are kept for months without a hearing, irrespective of guilt or innocence. Political prisoners are not unknown, although in recent months Torrijos has taken the precaution to clear out political prisoners during the treaty debate.

using the land upon which their property is located in accordance with the procedures established in that Article.

5. With respect to buildings and other improvements to real property located in areas of the former Canal Zone to which the aforesaid licensing procedure is not applicable, or may cease to be applicable during the lifetime or upon termination of this Treaty, the owners may continue to use the land upon which their property is located, subject to the payment of a reasonable charge to the Republic of Panama. Should the Republic of Panama decide to sell such land, the owners of the buildings or other improvements located thereon shall be offered a first option to purchase such land at a reasonable cost. In the case of non-profit enterprises, such as churches and fraternal organizations, the cost of purchase will be nominal in accordance with the prevailing practice in the rest of the territory of the Republic of Panama.

6. If any of the aforementioned persons are required by the Republic of Panama to discontinue their activities or vacate their property for public purposes, they shall be compensated at fair market value by the Republic of Panama.

7. The provisions of paragraphs 2-6 above shall apply to natural or judicial persons who have been engaged in business or non-profit activities at locations in the former Canal

Zone for at least six months prior to the date of signature of this Treaty.

8. The Republic of Panama shall not issue, adopt or enforce any law, decree, regulation, or international agreement or take any other action which purports to regulate or would otherwise interfere with the exercise on the part of the United States of America of any right granted under this Treaty or related agreements.

9. Vessels transiting the Canal, and cargo, passengers and crews carried on such vessels shall be exempt from any taxes, fees, or other charges by the Republic of Panama. However, in the event such vessels call at a Panamanian port, they may be assessed charges incident thereto, such as charges for services provided to the vessel. The Republic of Panama may also require the passengers and crew disembarking from such vessels to pay such taxes, fees and charges as are established under Panamanian law for persons entering its territory. Such taxes, fees and charges shall be assessed on a nondiscriminatory basis.

10. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama will cooperate in taking such steps as may from time to time be necessary to guarantee the security of the Panama Canal Commission, its property, its employees and their dependents, and their property, the Forces of the United States of America and the members thereof, the civilian component of the United States Forces, the dependents of members of the Forces and the civilian component, and their property, and the contractors of the Panama Canal Commission and of the United States Forces, their dependents, and their property. 8. This is a meaningless provision. Either we have treaty rights or we do not. What is the purpose of putting a clause in the treaty saying that Panama should not violate the treaty? Did the negotiators expect Panama to violate it?

Employment With the Panama Canal Commission

1. In exercising its rights and fulfilling its responsibilities as the employer, the United States of America shall establish employment and labor regulations which shall contain the terms, conditions and prerequisites for all categories of employees of the Panama Canal Commission. These regulations shall be provided to the Republic of Panama prior to their entry into force.

nationals employed by the Panama Canal Commission in relation to the total number of its employees will conform to the proportion established for foreign enterprises under the law of the Republic of Panama.

(b) The terms and conditions of employment to be established will in general be no less favorable to persons already employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, than those in effect immediately prior to that date.

3. (a) The United States of America shall establish an employment policy for the Panama Canal Commission that shall generally limit the recruitment of personnel outside the Republic of Panama to persons possessing requisite skills and qualifications which are not available in the Republic of Panama.

(b) The United States of America will establish training programs for Panamanian employees and apprentices in order to increase the number of Panamanian nationals qualified to assume positions with the Panama Canal Commission, as positions become available.

(c) Within five years from the entry into force of this Treaty, the number of United States nationals employed by the Panama Canal Commission who were previously employed by the Panama Canal Company shall be at least twenty percent less than the total number of United States nationals working clause seems to conflict with the standard requirement for "veterans' preference" in hiring by U.S. government agencies. The proportion of non-panamanian employees established for foreign enterprises under Panamanian law is 20 percent. After reduction of 43 percent of U.S. employees in fiscal year 1979, the proportion will still be 36 percent, requiring drastic RIF's or a ban on new U.S. hiring to reach a proportion of 20%.

(b) The phrase "in general" connotes not a continuation of vested job rights, but rather arbitrary discretion. However, since half the employees of both nationalities will be "RIFed", the distinction is academic.

3. (a) Since Panama's pool of job skills is small, pressure will be exerted to redefine or lower job requirements. This has already occurred with the acceptance of two Panamanian pilot-apprentices who did not meet the basic job requirements (they will be the first two Panamanian pilots).

(c) The requirement for 20% reduction in 5 years is conservative. Panama Canal Company plans estimate a 43% reduction the first year, and a 48.5% reduction within three years. This is based on job slots eliminated. In practice, many more will leave, including those with irreplaceable skills needed for op-for the Panama Canal Company immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

(d) The United States of America shall periodically inform the Republic of Panama, through the Coordinating Committee, established pursuant to the Agreement in Implementation of Article III of this Treaty, of available positions within the Panama Canal Commission. The Republic of Panama shall similarly provide the United States of America any information it may have as to the availability of Panamanian nationals claiming to have skills and qualifications that might be required by the Panama Canal Commission, in order that the United States of America may take this information into account.

4. The United States of America will establish qualification standards for skills, training and experience required by the Panama Canal Commission. In establishing such standards, to the extent they include a requirement for a professional license, the United States of America, without prejudice to its right to require additional professional skills and qualifications, shall recognize the professional licenses issued by the Republic of Panama.

eration. The latest poll of U.S. workers showed 69% prepared to leave. The requirement for a 20% reduction in 5 years is not to be confused with the requirement for a proportion of 20% U.S. workers required in Section 2(a).

(d) Once more this is a pressure mechanism. Note that the pool is not of workers who have skills, but only of workers who claim to have skills.

4. There is no assurance that the professional licenses of Panama are equivalent to those of the U.S., or even that Panama licenses certain professions. Pilots are a case in point, since Panama is not a seafaring nation.

5. The United States of America shall establish a policy for the periodic rotation, at a maximum of every five years, of United States citizen employees and other non-Panamanian employees, hired after the entry into force of this Treaty. It is recognized that certain exceptions to the said policy of rotation may be made for sound administrative reasons, such as in the case of employees holding positions requiring certain non-transferable or non-recruitable skills.

6. With regard to wages and fringe benefits, there shall be no discrimination on the basis of nationality, sex, or race. Payments by the Panama Canal Commission of additional remuneration, or the provision of other benefits, such as home leave benefits, to United States nationals employed prior to entry into force of this Treaty, or to persons of any nationality, including Panamanian nationals who are thereafter recruited outside of the Republic of Panama and who change their place of residence, shall not be considered to be discrimination for the purpose of this paragraph.

7. Persons employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, who are displaced from their employment as a result of this discontinuance by the United States of America of certain activities pursuant to this Treaty, will be placed by the United States of America, to the maximum extent feasible, in other appropriate jobs with the Government of the United States in accordance with Unit-

5. Some Canal workers are third or fourth generation Zonians. This includes not only U.S. citizens, but also black descendants of the original Canal builders from the West Indies, most of whom speak English and are discriminated against by the Spanish-speaking Panamanians. Contrary to the media stereotype many Zonians (about 20%) have intermarried with Panamanians. Because of their intimate knowledge of Panama, such employees are often the most strongly opposed to the treaties. They also fear for their children who were born in the Zone (about 80-90%) since Panama claims them as Panamanian citizens.

6. At the present time, all wages and benefits are on the basis of equal pay for equal work (except for the tropical differential necessary to induce U.S. citizens to leave the U.S. proper). The Panama Canal Company wages are about three times the rate paid for the same jobs in Panama. The U.S. minimum wage law applies in the Canal Zone.

5. This is fundamentally a punitive provision, grounded in resentment towards Canal Zone residents who have made the Isthmus their home. Although the 5-year rotation system is standard in U.S. military bases overseas, the Canal is a different situation, requiring the attention of career employees who dedicate themselves to the Canal as a life's work. Only long years of experience truly qualifies men for exacting and often hazardous operations. The exception clause will undoubtedly become a cause of strife.

6. The elimination of the tropical differential for new employees makes it probable that it will be difficult to attract necessary skills not available in Panama.

7. The employees are not reassured by the phrase "to the maximum extent feasible." For example, the transfer of teachers from the Canal Zone Government to DoD will cause friction because the Canal Zone Government has a higher wage and benefit scale appropriate to career teachers in a lifetime job. Their wage levels will be frozen, i.e., they will receive no raises in the future. Many others will find no equivalent employment.

ed States Civil Service regulations. For such persons who are not United States nationals, placement efforts will be confined to United States Government activities located within the Republic of Panama. Likewise, persons previously employed in activities for which the Republic of Panama assumes responsibility as a result of this Treaty will be continued in their employment to the maximum extent feasible by the Republic of Panama. The Republic of Panama shall, to the maximum extent feasible, ensure that the terms and conditions of employment applicable to personnel employed in the activities for which it assumes responsibility are no less favorable than those in effect immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty. Non-United States nationals employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government prior to the entry into force of this Treaty who are involuntarily separated from their positions because of the discontinuance of an activity by reason of this Treaty, who are not entitled to an immediate annuity under the United States Civil Service Retirement system, and for whom continued employment in the Republic of Panama by the Government of the United States of America is not practicable, will be provided special job placement assistance by the Republic of Panama for employment in positions for which they may be qualified by experience and training.

There is no guarantee of a transfer within Civil Service, only the right to be put on a waiting list at a time when RIF's are occurring in the U.S. There is no assistance for those who are not eligible for early retirement, but want to quit rather than give up their Constitutional rights.

Panamanian workers, particularly blacks, fear job discrimination if they are employed by Panamanian agencies. Those who must find work in the private sector will receive much lower wage scales. The offer of "special job placement assistance" is meaningless in a mismanaged economy that already has high unemployment, zero economic growth, and will have hundreds, if not thousands, looking for work at the same time.

8. The Parties agree to establish a system whereby the Panama Canal Commission may, if deemed mutually convenient or desirable by the two Parties, assign certain employees of the Panama Canal Commission, for a limited period of time, to assist in the operation of activities transferred to the responsibility of the Republic of Panama as a result of this Treaty or related agreements. The salaries and other costs of employment of any such persons assigned to provide such assistance shall be reimbursed to the United States of America by the Republic of Panama.

9. (a) The right of employees to negotiate collective contracts with the Panama Canal Commission is recognized. Labor relations with employees of the Panama Canal Commission shall be conducted in accordance with forms of collective bargaining established by the United States of America after consultation with employee unions.

(b) Employee unions shall have the right to affiliate with international labor organizations.

10. The United States of America will provide an appropriate early optional retirement program for all persons employed by the Panama Canal Company or Canal Zone Government immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty. In this regard, taking into account the unique circumstances created by the provisions of this Treaty, including its duration, and their effect upon such employees, the United States of America shall, with respect to them:

(a) determine that conditions exist which invoke applicable United States law permitting early retirement annuities and apply

8. The loan of expertise may help in the transition, but it still does not eliminate the political mismanagement that has brought Panamanian governmental services and enterprises to a standstill.

9. (a) The right of collective bargaining is mocked by other treaty provisions which call for RIF's of U.S. employees and of Panamanians whose job functions will be divested from the Canal organization.

10. The full cost of this provision is not yet clear. It will be disguised in the Civil Service Retirement System budget and has been estimated at $7.5 million per year, or $165 million over 22 years. The Administration has not yet provided the legislation proposed, so neither the U.S. Senate nor the Canal employees know what this means.

Article XI

Provisions for the transition period

1. The Republic of Panama shall reassume plenary jurisdiction over the former Canal Zone upon entry into force of this Treaty and in accordance with its terms. In order to provide for an orderly transition to the full application of the jurisdictional arrangements established by this Treaty and related agreements, the provision of this Article shall become applicable upon the date this Treaty enters into force, and shall remain in effect for thirty calendar months. The authority granted in this Article to the United States of America for this transition period shall supplement, and is not intended to limit, the full application and effect of the rights and authority granted to the United States of America elsewhere in this Treaty and in related agreements.

Article XI

At the present time, U.S. citizen employees need not hazard their chances with the justice of a military dictator or the brutality of the Guardia and Panamanian justice.

Article XI

Although these provisions are supposed to ease tensions, they will increase the apprehension of U.S. citizens in Panama. First, there is a confusion in definition between "the former Canal Zone" and "the areas and installations made available for the use of the United States." Second, Panama assumes "plenary jurisdiction" over the former Canal Zone, but the U.S. retains "primary jurisdiction" over certain criminal offenses. In any case, Panama will have criminal jurisdiction over U.S. citizens who are charged with offenses outside of U.S. installations. It will be virtually impossible for a U.S. citizen not to subject himself to Panamanian jurisdiction. A further confusion is introduced with the "joint police patrols" with opportunities for dispute over jurisdiction. The whole article must be read in the light of Article XIX, "Criminal Jurisdiction," of the Agreement in Implementation of Article III. In that agreement, Panama reserves the right to keep U.S. citizens in custody who are charged with murder, rape, robbery with violence, trafficking in drugs or crime against the security of the Panamanian state.

2. During this transition period, the criminal and civil laws of the United States of America shall apply concurrently with those of the Republic of Panama in certain of the areas and installations made available for the use of the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty, in accordance with the following provisions:

(a) The Republic of Panama permits the authorities of the United States of America to have the primary right to exercise criminal jurisdiction over United States citizen employees of the Panama Canal Commission and their dependents, and members of the United States Forces and civilian component and their dependents, in the following cases:

(i) for any offense committed during the transition period within such areas and installations, and

(ii) for any offense committed prior to that period in the former Canal Zone.

The Republic of Panama shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction over all other offenses committed by such persons, except as otherwise provided in this Treaty and related agreements or as may be otherwise agreed.

(b) Either Party may waive its primary right to exercise jurisdiction in a specific case or category of cases.

3. The United States of America shall retain the right to exercise jurisdiction in criminal cases relating to offenses committed prior to the entry into force of this Treaty in violation of the laws applicable in the former Canal Zone.

4. For the transition period, the United States of America shall retain police authority and maintain a police force in the aforementioned areas and installations. In such areas, the police authorities of the United States of America may take into custody any person not subject to their primary jurisdiction if such person is believed to have committed or to be committing an offense against applicable laws or regulations, and shall promptly transfer custody to the police authorities of the Republic of Panama. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish joint police patrols in agreed areas. Any arrests conducted by a joint patrol shall be the responsibility of the patrol member or members representing the Party having primary jurisdiction over the person or persons arrested.

5. The courts of the United States of America and related personnel, functioning in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty, may continue to function during the transition period for the judicial enforcement of the jurisdiction to be exercised by the United States of America in accordance with this Article.

6. In civil cases, the civilian courts of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall have no jurisdiction over new cases of a private civil nature, but shall retain full jurisdiction during the transition period to dispose of any civil cases, including admiralty cases, already instituted and pending before the courts prior to the entry into force of this treaty.

7. The laws, regulations, and administrative authority of the United States of America applicable in the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty shall, to the extent not inconsistent with this Treaty and related agreements, continue in force for the purpose of the exercise by the United States of America of law enforcement and judicial jurisdiction only during the transition period. The United States of America may amend, repeal or otherwise change such laws, regulations and administrative authority. The two Parties shall consult concerning procedural and substantive matters relative to the implementation of this Article, including the disposition of cases pending at the end of the transition period and, in this respect, may enter into appropriate agreements by an exchange of notes or other instrument.

8. During this transition period, the United States of America may continue to incarcerate individuals in the areas and installation made available for the use of the United States of America by the Republic of Panama pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, or to transfer them to penal facilities in the United States of America to serve their sentences.

Article XII

A sea-level canal or a third lane of locks

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama recognize that a sea-level canal may be important for international navigation in the future. Consequently, during the duration of this Treaty, both Parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea-level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms, agreeable to both Parties, for its construction.

Article XII

Article XII

1. A Sea Level Canal inside Panama is politically impractical, since the huge investment would be taken over by Panama. It is also economically infeasible. The only practical alternative would be in Nicaragua, an alternative approved by the 1931 Sultan Commission study. Although the 1970 study of the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Study Commission recommended a Panamanian site, a more recent study of the Nicaraguan site, based on new construction techniques perfected in Louisiana, says that Nicaragua is feasible. It would not however, be justified unless the Panama Canal were denied to the U.S. Section 1 commits the parties only to a study not to a project; Section 2 prohibits the U.S. both from negotiation or construction with a third party. Such negotiation may be the only leverage we would still hold over Panama to obtain cooperation.

2. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree on the following:

(a) No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this Treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty or as the two Parties may otherwise agree; and

(b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

3. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States of America the right to add a third lane of locks to the existing Panama Canal. This right may be exercised at any time during the duration of this Treaty, provided that the United States of America has delivered to the Republic of Panama copies of the plans for such construction.

4. In the event the United States of America exercises the right granted in paragraph 3 above, it may use for that purpose, in addition to the areas otherwise made available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty, such other areas as the two Parties may agree upon. The terms and conditions applicable to Canal operating areas made available by the Republic of Panama for the use of the United States of America pursuant to Article III of this Treaty shall apply in a similar manner to such additional areas.

5. In the construction of the aforesaid works, the United States of America shall not use nuclear excavation techniques without the previous consent of the Republic of Panama.

3. At the present time, the U.S. has ample authority within its sovereign powers to construct a third lane of locks. Such a project was started in 1942, and $76 million was spent on excavations which could still be used in the project. All construction and all water levels would remain within the present Canal Zone. In addition, $95 million was spent on the enlargement of Gaillard Cut, making a total of $171 million spent in major modernization.

5. Nuclear excavation has already been ruled out by the results of Project Plowshare tests and by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Property transfer and economic participation by the Republic of Panama

1. Upon termination of this Treaty, the Republic of Panama shall assume total responsibility for the management, operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal, which shall be turned over in operating condition and free of liens and debts, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

Article XIII

1. The requirement that the Canal be turned over "in operating condition" could cost billions of dollars if the Canal were destroyed by war, earthquake, major slides or Panamanian sabotage. The requirement that the Canal be turned over "free of liens and debts" implies that any cumulative operating deficits would have to be paid from the U.S. Treasury. According to testimony, the Panamanian interpretation that the $10 million payment to be paid out of "surplus", if no surplus is earned in 22 years, becomes a U.S. obligation ($220 million) under this clause.

2. The U.S. transfers all title immediately to Panama, and retains only use. A cloud is cast upon our title by the word may. The transfer of property without authorization by both Houses of Congress is unconstitutional under Article IV, Section 3. No provision is made for the recovery of the U.S. investment in the Canal, either through depreciation or through payment; indeed, the transfer is "without charge" to Panama. Although the treaty mentions only the transfer of "non-removable" assets, as a practical matter most removable assets will be given away too.

2. The United States of America transfers, without charge, to the Republic of Panama all right, title and interest the United States of America may have with respect to all real property, including non-removable improvements thereon, as set forth below:

(a) Upon the entry into force of this Treaty, the Panama Railroad and such property that was located in the former Canal Zone but that is not within the land and water areas the use of which is made available to the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty. However, it is agreed that the transfer on such date shall not include buildings and other facilities, except housing, the use of which is retained by the United States of America pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, outside such areas;

(b) Such property located in an area or a portion thereof at such time as the use by the United States of America of such area or portion thereof ceases pursuant to agreement between the two Parties.

(c) Housing units made available for occupancy by members of the Armed Forces of the Republic of Panama in accordance with paragraph 5(b) of Annex B to the Agreement in Implementation of Article IV of this Treaty at such time as such units are made available to the Republic of Panama.

(d) Upon termination of this Treaty, all real property and non-removable improvements that were used by the United States of America for the purposes of this Treaty and related agreements and equipment related to the management, operation and maintenance of the Canal remaining in the Republic of Panama.

3. The Republic of Panama agrees to hold the United States of America harmless with respect to any claims which may be made by third parties relating to rights, title and interest in such property.

4. The Republic of Panama shall receive, in addition, from the Panama Canal Commission a just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal, in accordance with the following:

(a) An annual amount to be paid out of Canal operating revenues computed at a rate of thirty hundredths of a United States dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its

4. The Panama Canal Company is a U.S. Corporation under 31 U.S.C. 846, and is subject to standard rules of accounting for government agencies. All revenues are paid into the U.S. Treasury, and drawn out only according to appropriations authorized by law. The annual payment of $2.3 million is paid out of State Department appropriations. The Treasury is reimbursed $519 million of this from the Panama Canal Company revenues, a sum representing in devalued dollars an

4. Panama has dedicated no resources to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection, and defense of the Panama Canal, other than the rainfall which flows into the Chagres River basin. It is the U.S. which has dedicated all such resources.

The payment mechanism specified in the treaty is unconstitutional. The annual amount is to be "paid out of Canal operating revenues." The fixed annuity is to be "paid out of Canal operating revenues." The con-equivalency, for each vessel transiting the Canal after the entry into force of this Treaty, for which tolls are charged. The rate of thirty hundredths of a United States dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, will be adjusted to reflect changes in the United States wholesale price index for total manufactured goods during biennial periods. The first adjustment shall take place five years after entry into force of this Treaty, taking into account the changes that occurred in such price index during the preceding two years. Thereafter, successive adjustments shall take place at the end of each biennial period. If the United States of America should decide that another indexing method is preferable, such method shall be proposed to the Republic of Panama and applied if mutually agreed.

(b) A fixed annuity of ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) to be paid out of Canal operating revenues. This amount shall constitute a fixed expense of the Panama Canal Commission.

(c) An annual amount of up to ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per year, to be paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts paid pursuant to this Treaty. In the event Canal operating revenues in any tingent payment is to be "paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures." Payments cannot be made to Panama by the Panama Canal Commission. As a U.S. government agency, all revenues must be paid into the Treasury, whence they can be drawn out only by funds appropriated by law. These are funds which belong to and could accrue to the benefit of the U.S. taxpayers. Thus even if payments to Panama are appropriated from the Treasury according to the treaty formula, it is an error to say that no appropriated funds are involved.

Settlement of disputes

In the event that any question should arise between the Parties concerning the interpretation of this Treaty or related agreements, they shall make every effort to resolve the matter through consultation in the appropriate committees established pursuant to this Treaty and related agreements, or, if appropriate, through diplomatic channels. In the event the Parties are unable to resolve a particular matter through such means, they may, in appropriate cases, agree to submit the matter to conciliation, mediation, arbitration, or such other procedure for the peaceful settlement of the dispute as they may mutually deem appropriate.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

The Republic of Panama declares that the Canal, as an international transit waterway, shall be permanently neutral in accordance with the regime established in this Treaty. The same regime neutrality shall apply to any other international waterway that may be built either partially or wholly in the territory of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE II

The Republic of Panama declares the neutrality of the Canal in order that both in time of peace and in time of war it shall remain secure and open to peaceful transit by the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there will be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, concerning the conditions or charges of transit, or for any other reason, and so that the Canal, and therefore the Isthmus of Panama, shall not be the target of reprisals in any armed conflict between other nations of the world. The foregoing shall be subject to the following requirements:

- (a) Payment of tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services, provided they have been fixed in conformity with the provisions of Article III(c);
- (b) Compliance with applicable rules and regulations, provided such rules and regulations are applied in conformity with the provisions of Article III;
- (c) The requirement that transiting vessels commit no acts of hostility while in the Canal; and
- (d) Such other conditions and restrictions as are established by this Treaty.

ARTICLE III

1. For purposes of the security, efficiency and proper maintenance of the Canal the following rules shall apply:

(a) The Canal shall be operated efficiently in accordance with conditions of transit through the Canal, and rules and regulations that shall be just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the Canal;

(b) Ancillary services necessary for transit through the Canal shall be provided;

(c) Tolls and other charges for transit and ancillary services shall be just, reasonable, equitable and consistent with the principles of international law;

(d) As a pre-condition of transit, vessels may be required to establish clearly the financial responsibility and guarantees for payment of reasonable and adequate indemnification, consistent with international practice and standards, for damages resulting from acts or omissions of such vessels when passing through the Canal. In the case of vessels owned or operated by a State or for which it has acknowledged responsibility, a certification by that State that it shall observe its obligations under international law to pay for damages resulting from the act or omission of such vessels when passing through the Canal shall be deemed sufficient to establish such financial responsibility;

(e) Vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of all nations shall at all times be entitled to transit the Canal, irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination or armament, without being subjected, as a condition of transit, to inspection, search or surveillance. However, such vessels may be required to certify that they have complied with all applicable health, sanitation and quarantine regulations. In addition, such vessels shall be entitled to refuse to disclose their internal operation, origin, armament, cargo or destination. However, auxiliary vessels may be required to present written assurances, certified by an official at a high level of the government of the State requesting the exemption, that they are owned or operated by that government and in this case are being used only on government non-commercial service.

2. For the purposes of this Treaty, the terms "Canal," "vessel of war," "auxiliary vessel," "internal operation," "armament" and "inspection" shall have the meanings assigned them in Annex A to this Treaty.

ARTICLE IV

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE V

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the Canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

ARTICLE VI

1. In recognition of the important contributions of the United States of America and of the Republic of Panama to the construction, operation, maintenance, and protection and defense of the Canal, vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of those nations shall, notwithstanding any other provisions of this Treaty, be entitled to transit the Canal irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination, armament or cargo carried. Such vessels of war and auxiliary vessels will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously.

2. The United States of America, so long as it has responsibility for the operation of the Canal, may continue to provide the Republic of Colombia toll-free transit through the Canal * * * Thereafter, the Republic of Panama may provide the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Costa Rica with the right of toll-free transit.

ARTICLE VII

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall jointly sponsor a resolution in the Organization of American States opening to accession by all nations of the world the Protocol to this Treaty whereby all the signatories will adhere to the objectives of this Treaty, agreeing to respect the regime of neutrality set forth herein.

2. The Organization of American States shall act as the depositary for this Treaty and related instruments.

ARTICLE VIII

This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Panama Canal Treaty, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

Done at Washington, this 7th day of September, 1977, in the English and Spanish language, both texts being equally authentic.

ANNEX

The magnitude of the dismemberment of the Canal organization cannot be appreciated from the bare terms of the Annex. The Panama Canal Commission will lose 58% of the land available to the present Company for operating the Canal, 43% of its present U.S. employees, 52% of its present Panamanian employees, and 69% of its non-toll revenues (35.6% of all revenues.) Although some of these employees may transfer to other U.S. or Panamanian entities, there is considerable doubt that present pay rates and job benefits will be preserved. During the Armed Services Committee hearings, I requested Governor Parfitt to provide detailed statistics on the dismemberment of the Canal organization, and he supplied the following official charts:

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 11 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will resume consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, first session, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, first session, Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

Mr. SCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the distinguished Senator from West Virginia desire recognition?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott), without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have a statement to make with regard to the Panama Canal treaties, and I assume the distinguished majority leader yields for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, near the beginning of what may become a historic debate, one of vital interest to the people of this country, I believe we should not only closely examine these treaties and use our own best judgment in determining how to vote on them, but before voting should reflect upon the type of government we have in the United States and the part the people of the country should play in the decisionmaking process.

I am sure each Senator has received a substantial amount of mail, and that some of the mail is generated one way or another by groups with a special interest in the outcome. Because of this, I included a question in an annual opinion poll submitted to the people of Virginia last month. The newsletter containing the poll was sent to more than 400,000 Virginia homes. Let me add that the newsletter is sent to all registered voters in two of our congressional districts and to a representative group of citizens in the remainder of Virginia, of both political parties and holding differing philosophies of government. Our response to the question, "Would you vote to ratify the proposed treaties?" was 13 percent "yes" and 87 percent "no."

Mr. President, in 1820 when Thomas Jefferson wrote from Monticello to a friend regarding some constitutional questions he said:

I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education.

Since 1820, of course, the general level of education throughout our country has risen considerably. I believe that with the ultimate sovereignty residing in the people of the country, we cannot, in making a decision, decline to be swayed at least in part by the overwhelming desire of the American people that these treaties be rejected. Next week we will be in recess, and I believe it will afford an excellent opportunity for any Senator who is in doubt about the feeling of the people of his State to confer with them.

In my own judgment, these treaties were written from the viewpoint of appeasing Panama and not from the viewpoint of what is best for the United States. I have no conflict in voting the way the overwhelming majority of Virginians believe and in accordance with my own personal belief. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, one of our great patriotic organizations, refers to the canal treaty as a "payaway." They do not define this word but I believe we can surmise that it is more than giving away a part of the United States, it is paying a foreign country to take the American Canal Zone. I say American Canal Zone knowing that we will have debate as to where sovereignty resides and there may well be a basis for a difference of opinion on this question.

Nevertheless, for the past 75 years, since the 1903 treaty, since we acquired the proprietary interests of the private owners and squatters, since we acquired the interest of the French Canal Co. and subsequently paid $25 million for the recognition by Columbia that we had a valid title, that we owned the canal, we have exercised complete and exclusive control over this zone.

Not now being a candidate for reelection to the Senate, I may have a greater degree of political freedom than most. Yet, the gist of my initial remarks is this: Let us confirm to our own people and to the world that in America the people rule. The American people are opposed to these treaties. I urge my colleagues that they get in close touch with those they represent before casting their vote on the matters before us.

(Mr. Sarbanes assumed the chair.)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as one who has represented the people of the State of West Virginia for a period now of going on 32 years—6 years in the two houses of the State legislature, 6 years in the U.S. House of Representatives, and now going into my 20th year in the Senate, may I say to the able Senator from Virginia, I think I know what my responsibilities are to the people of West Virginia and to the people of the United States.

There is no question but that the majority of West Virginians today oppose the treaties. The easy vote for me, would be to vote against the treaties.

There is no political mileage to be gained in voting for these treaties.

I know what my constituents are saying. However, I have a responsibility not only to follow them and to represent them but also to inform them and to lead them when, in my judgment, based on the facts as I have carefully weighed them, it is in the best interests of the United States that the treaties be approved. That is my responsibility to the people of West Virginia—to act in the best interests of the United States as my lights allow me to see the facts and to understand what is in the best interests of the United States—because what is in the best interests of the United States is in the best interests of West Virginia and West Virginians.

Edmund Burke said:

Your representative owes you not only his industry but also his judgment, and he betrays rather than serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

I am not going to betray my responsibility to my constituents. I owe them not only my industry but I also owe them my judgment. That is why they send me here. If I am to reach a judgment based only on the number of names on a petition or upon the weight of the mail, what we need is a computer and a set of scales, not a Senator, to represent the people of West Virginia in the U.S. Senate.

They understand. But when I differ with them in my viewpoint, it is for the reason that, based on the facts as I have weighed them—as contained in the committee hearings, the committee reports, my own personal study of the issues and the treaties, and my personal observations during my visit to Panama—I have reached a judgment, an honest judgment, a sincere judgment, a considered judgment, that the position I take is, as I see it, in the best interests of the United States of America today and in the future.

So much for the polls, the letters, and the percentages. We have a responsibility under the Constitution, and I say that every Senator here will seek to uphold that responsibility whether he votes for or against the treaties.

But to urge that we contact our people and see what they are saying, I should think that a Senator who has been here for 20 years, in the Congress for 26 years, and representing the people of West Virginia for 31 years, knows and is not oblivious to what they are saying.

Woodrow Wilson said that one of the most important functions of the legislative branch is to inform the people, not just to legislate.

And that is one of my responsibilities, to help the people not only of West Virginia but also my colleagues and the people of this country to better understand what it is that we are debating, to better understand the ignominious history of the 1903 treaty—if there ever was an example of rough-riding diplomacy, Mr. President, that was it par excellence—and to better understand the contents of the new treaties. How many of those who implore, and urge me and you, I say to the minority leader, and to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky who ably presides over this Senate today, with a degree of dignity and efficiency and skill as rare as a day in June—how many of those who urge us to oppose the treaties have actually read the contents of these treaties? It is up to us Senators to read the contents and to reread and to reread the contents of the treaties.

And so we have to weigh all of these considerations in reaching our considered judgment as to what is in the long run best interests of the people of West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, Alabama, Maryland, and the other States in this great Union.

West Virginia has a very special interest in this canal dating back to the days of its construction. I now read from David McCullough's book, "The Path Between the Sea," page 597:

Among the more fascinating facts about the Panama Canal, for example, is that all hardware for the lock gates—the lifting mechanisms for the stem valves, the special bearings, gears, and struts for the gate machines, all ninety-two bull wheels—was made by a single manufacturer in Wheeling, West Virginia.

So, Mr. President, the emotional feelings of West Virginians toward this canal predate today. They predate the month of September of last year when the signing of the treaties was witnessed across the Nation. They go back to the early days of the construction of that canal.

Now it has just been said by my distinguished and beloved friend from Virginia, Mr. Scott, that we paid $25 million to Colombia to show "that we had a valid title to the Canal Zone."

Mr. President, we paid $25 million to Colombia not to show that we had a "valid title to the Canal Zone" but, rather, as an indemnity to Colombia for the loss of Panama.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, just in a minute.

Potentially the most valuable province in all of Colombia in that age. That was why we paid $25 million, and it was not paid until 1921, 7 years after the completion of the canal.

Mr. SCOTT ADDRESSED THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Huddleston). The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure the majority leader would want to properly quote my remarks and since I was reading the statement I made was "and subsequently paid $25 million for the recognition by Colombia that we held a valid title," which is just a slight variation. And, Mr. President, if the distinguished leader will yield further—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to thank him for that correction? I misquoted him. I used the word "had;" he used the word "held." But the key words in his statement are these: "A valid title to the Canal Zone."

Mr. SCOTT. The distinguished Senator is quite correct. I have studied all of these documents, as I am sure the distinguished leader has, and I would agree with him that every Senator should read the various treaties. I have read the 1903 treaty. I have read both of the treaties. Now I have read the book that the distinguished Senator has on his desk and another book on the subject. I have attempted to inform myself as fully as possible, and I would agree with our distinguished majority leader that we do have a responsibility to exercise our own judgment, that we should not have a computer representing the people of any State here in the Senate. But I would add to that that we also have a responsibility to listen to the voice of the people and when the overwhelming majority of the people of the United States—and I firmly believe that the overwhelming majority of the people of the United States are opposed to this treaty, it should be persuasive, and I believe that at the next election we will see that it does have an effect upon the makeup of this Senate. I am not going to be a candidate for reelection; the distinguished leader is not up for reelection this year. But I believe that this year we will see that the people of America want their voices to be heard.

If I could just read a portion more from the works of Thomas Jefferson, this letter that I was quoting from a while ago. He says further on "My personal interest in such questions is entirely extinct." Now I assume he said that because he was no longer President. He had left the White House more than 10 years before 1820. "But not my wishes for the longest possible continuance of our Government on its pure principles."

And so at least this is the feeling of Thomas Jefferson, a great Virginian, a great American, one of our early Presidents, and I think it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I shall yield briefly in a moment. The distinguished Senator from Virginia is entitled to the respect of every Member of this Senate in what he says. But I say that it is our duty to take a while for debate on these treaties so as to inform the American people, as best we can, as to the history of the 1903 treaty, as to the contents of the new treaties, and as to the impact of either rejection or ratification of the treaties on the future foreign relations of the United States with Latin American countries and other countries of the world. And then, based on an informed opinion on the part of the American public, I venture to say that the polls will reflect a different attitude toward the treaties by the American people.

As an example, on February 2, 1978, George Gallup ran a poll. Here is the title: "U.S. Public Opinion Shifts to Support of Panama Treaties":

Among the large majority of Americans who have heard or read about the debate over the Panama Canal treaties, opinion is now closely divided with 45 per cent in favor and 42 per cent opposed. A survey taken three months ago showed opinion 48 to 40 per cent in opposition.

So you can see a shift in opinion.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator read the question he asked, though? That makes a difference.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have not yielded to the Senator from Kansas. Will the Senator read the earlier question?

Mr. DOLE. I do not have it with me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator asks if I have the question that was asked in the Gallup poll. Does the Senator have the earlier question, which he said was different?

Mr. DOLE. I know they are different.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It does depend, I will say to the able Senator from Kansas, a lot on how the questions are phrased by the pollsters.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let me finish the quotation first:

The latest survey was conducted in early January and therefore does not reflect the possible effect of the Carter administration's "January offensive."

Before I yield to the distinguished minority leader:

Following is the survey question to determine the level of support for the treaties.

So I do have it. Here is one of the questions:

The treaties would give Panama full control over the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone by the year 2000, but the United States would retain the right to defend the canal against a third nation. Do you favor or opposes these treaties between the U.S. and Panama?

The survey was broken down into various groups. One was designated as the "better informed" group—in other words, those who could answer all three questions correctly—and in that group the poll showed 57 to 39 percent in favor of the treaties.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record the questions and the percentages with respect to the responses to those questions in the Gallup poll to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

U.S. PUBLIC OPINION SHIFTS TO SUPPORT OF PANAMA TREATIES

(By George Gallup)

PRINCETON, N.J. Among the large majority of Americans who have heard or read about the debate over the Panama Canal treaties, opinion is now closely divided with 45 percent in favor and 42 percent opposed. A survey taken three months ago showed opinion 48 to 40 percent in opposition.

The latest survey was conducted in early January and therefore does not reflect the possible effect of the Carter administration's "January offensive," a nationwide effort by administration officials to inform the American public about the key facts of the treaties.

An important finding from this survey is that the more Americans know about the Panama Canal treaties, the more likely they are to favor Senate ratification, as seen in the views of the "better informed."

The "better informed" are defined as those who are able to correctly answer three questions dealing with key facts about the treaties: the year the canal is to be turned over to the Republic of Panama; whether or not the U.S. has the right to defend the canal against third-nation attacks; and whether or not the biggest U.S. aircraft carriers and supertankers are able to use the canal.

The vote among this "better informed" group (i.e., those who can answer all three questions correctly) is 57 to 39 per cent in favor of the treaties, as seen below:

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I now yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader. I am reluctant to interrupt his presentation, and I will not take very long, but I must say that the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Virginia got my attention, because in that colloquy, in which he identified the majority leader and himself, in the one case the Senator is not up for reelection and in the other case the Senator is not running for reelection; and as far as I could tell, I was the only one who is running for reelection. Like the hod carrier who got hit across the nose with a 2-by-4, that got my attention.

Mr. President, all I want to say, as I have said previously to my good friend from Virginia, for whom I have great respect, and we have discussed the issue before—all I want to say is, let no one think that being up for reelection in 1978 makes one's position easier to decide. It does not. I have traveled in Tennessee, and I am aware of the concern about this.

It reminds me of what my father told me once about the sovereign electorate: You can doubt their judgment, but you had better never doubt their authority.

The reason I asked the majority leader to yield was to say, Mr. President, I think one of the key issues in this debate so far hinges on one of the statements made by the Senator from Virginia. I refer to his feeling that the country is overwhelmingly opposed to these treaties.

I do not think that is so. I think the country is overwhelmingly opposed to these treaties as they were submitted, but I think the country will support these treaties as I believe the Senate may amend them.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished minority leader for that very pertinent observation.

Mr. President, it was 131 years ago tomorrow—February 10, 1847—that President James K. Polk submitted to the Senate for advice and consent a treaty with the Republic of New Granada, later to become the Republic of Colombia.

Submission of that treaty—a treaty of “peace, amity, navigation, and commerce”—followed by 12 years the adoption of a Senate resolution requesting the President to open negotiations with other nations, particularly those of Central America and New Granada, “for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them * * * to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and of securing forever—securing forever—the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established * * *”

The treaty submitted to the Senate in 1847 guaranteed the U.S. freedom of transit across the Isthmus of Panama while the United States guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus and New Granada's—Colombia's—rights of sovereignty and property in the isthmus.

In his message to the Senate, President Polk said the purpose of the agreement was not for a political objective but to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the isthmus.

Mr. President, here we are, 131 years later, confronted with treaties the purposes of which are to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the isthmus. Over a century and a quarter ago, that was the import of the President's message. The purpose was not for a political objective. The purpose was to secure to all nations free and equal right of passage over the isthmus.

The Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of that treaty, and it entered into force in 1848. Although it did enable construction of the Panama Railroad, the United States and Colombia were never able to reach a final agreement on construction of a canal.

In 1903, the Senate gave its approval to the Hay-Herran Treaty, authorizing the United States to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. However, the Colombian Senate unanimously rejected the treaty, with the opposition focusing on the threat to Colombia's sovereignty and what was regarded by the Colombians as inadequate payment to their country.

Later that year, with the clear encouragement of the United States, the Department of Panama declared its independence from Colombia and formed the Republic of Panama. U.S. forces, acting to maintain peaceful transit of the isthmus—get this, now—prevented Colombian troops from putting down the revolution.

In other words, we acted in violation of our solemn responsibilities, duties, and promise to Colombia, recognizing the sovereignty of Colombia over the province of Panama. It was the United States which prevented Colombian troops from effectively utilizing and exercising Colombia's rightful sovereignty.

Fifteen days after the uprising, before any Panamanian had had a chance to read it, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was signed.

How do you like that? Before any Panamanian had had a chance to read it, it was signed—the treaty that no Panamanian ever signed. That is what we are talking about, the 1903 treaty. It was negotiated for Panama by Philippe Bunau-Varilla, a French citizen, and—get this—a major stockholder in the French canal company, a man who had not been in Panama for 18 years.

Under the agreement, the French company was paid $40 million for its holding. The Panamanian Government was paid additional compensation of $10 million. Colombia was eventually paid an indemnity of $25 million in 1921, settling differences arising out of the events of 1903.

How did Bunau-Varilla come out in the transaction? Well, let us turn to page 401 of McCullough's book.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Not at this point, but I will later. I will be delighted to.

Let us refer to page 401 of David McCullough's book, "The Path Between the Seas."

The Bunau-Varilla firm, for example, recovered all of its 2,200,000 franc stake ($440,000)—

Not just chicken feed even today—"in the Compagnie Nouvelle,"—in other words, the company "plus a profit"—they were doing pretty well—"of about 66,000 francs, or $13,200."

That is a pretty good haul for Bunau-Varilla, the man who wrote and negotiated the treaties, the man who signed the treaties on behalf of Panama.

The Panamanian provisional government ratified the treaty on December 2, 1903, upon the strong urging of Bunau-Varilla and the United States.

Now I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. LAXALT. Is it true that at the time Bunau-Varilla came here to negotiate the treaties, he was a paid representative of the then Panamanian Government?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. He had very adroitly manipulated himself into the position of securing from that revolutionary junta, the title of minister plenipotentiary. What I am saying is that he was not a Panamanian, he had not been in Panama for 18 years but he himself had a personal financial interest in seeing that the treaty was signed, and he, himself drafted the treaty in its English form.

Mr. LAXALT. But aside from the fact that he had a personal interest in the outcome of the transaction, which may not have been all that bad, we must remember that at that time Panama was a struggling little crown colony of Colombia from which it had attempted many, many times, unsuccessfully, to obtain their independence. Because of his intercession in coming here and his successfully negotiating that treaty, Panama for the first time attained its independence.

Moreover, it must be remembered that after the treaty was negotiated here it was thereafter ratified by the Panamanian Government on the Federal level as well as on the local level.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, with a pistol——

Mr. LAXALT. And it was considered throughout the country as a triumph for Panama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. As it were, with a pistol at its temple.

Mr. LAXALT. Just as the Panama Government was taken in 1968 by General Torrijos.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No, on. The Senator seeks to confuse the issue. Let us stick with the original history of how this rough-riding diplomacy occurred.

Mr. LAXALT. I would suggest to the majority leader, and respectfully, that history does not indicate that at all; that at the time when we entered into the treaty here, negotiated it and had it ratified, it was welcomed by all Panamanians. They had celebrations all over that little country, and well they might, because at that time they were a pest hole ridden by disease, and this canal presented to them an economic salvation as well as a political independence from Colombia. I think history would indicate that, rather than doing disservice to that little country, we rendered them a great service.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. As we look back—it is great to have hindsight—as we look back over the years which have transpired since, yes, one can say that we rendered a service to the people of Panama. And we did, by ridding the jungles in that area of malaria and yellow fever. But at the time the governmental sanction of the treaties was, as it were, at the point of a gun, because there was the threat, not only implicit but explicit, that “If you don’t ratify these treaties, the United States will withdraw its military forces.”

And then what would have happened to the revolutionaries? Not only would the government have fallen, but the heads of those leaders of the revolution would have rolled in the streets.

Mr. LAXALT. But is it not true that those revolutionaries at the time represented the Panamanian aspirations for freedom and independence?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They represented the aspirations of some of the people.

Mr. LAXALT. Of most of the people.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of some of the people.

Mr. LAXALT. Of a vast majority.

Mr. HATCH. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I would be delighted to.

I believe the Senator from Nevada complained yesterday because he had been interrupted, during the reading of his eloquent speech, by Senators who wanted to ask questions. I welcome questions.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator would like me to ask questions now, I have a couple which I believe pertain to this specific point.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Is it not true also, I ask the distinguished majority leader, that David McCullough also wrote that not only did the Panamanian Government approve these treaties, but that the cabinet representing the Panamanian people approved the 1903 treaty, and then the full, complete Panamanian Governments in 1936 and 1955 reaffirmed modified treaties which took out many of the reprehensible aspects which had been criticized by those who criticized the treaties at the time? So we have had three approvals by the Panamanian Governments of the 1903, 1936 and 1955 combined treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We have had approval by the Panamanian Governments of modifications of the 1903 treaty. One of those modifications was not only that the payments be increased but also that the United States relinquished its control over some of the lands and waters—

Mr. HATCH. And the United States—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Senator will allow me.

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD (continuing). Over some of the lands and waters, the use of which had been granted to the United States under the 1903 treaty, which, to me, is a clear point to substantiate the position that I take, to wit, that the United States has never had sovereignty—never had sovereignty—over the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I have to admit that I do not find sovereignty to be that great an issue.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is one of the things.

Mr. HATCH. If I may finish.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have the floor.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator yielded to me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am saying that one of the items in that 1936 treaty was a modification of the 1903 treaty, which modification favors the Panamanians and recognizes the justice of their cause, and, moreover, underwrites the fact that the United States never was given sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the beginning and does not have sovereignty today.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator will yield again, I do not think that sovereignty is the major issue here.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It is one of the issues.

Mr. HATCH. Some of my colleagues do.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It is one of the issues.

Mr. HATCH. They may very well be right. But the point is this: The point that I was trying to bring out is that on three occasions, Panamanian officials approved this treaty. It has only been since the 1960's that we have had the major difficulties here with the advent of Torrijos.

All I am trying to point out is that we should not be led to believe that this was just a total reprehensible situation, where the Panamanians never had any decisionmaking role in the confirmation of these treaties, because they did. And they did on more than one occasion, long after the fact of the 1903 treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for letting me interrupt him.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Shortly.

Yes, Panamanians have agreed to subsequent treaties. But I reiterate that those treaties were modifications of the 1903 treaties, and justifiable modifications and were written in recognition by the United States of the justification for higher payments and for relinquishing control over some of the lands and waters—

Mr. HATCH. It was more than that.

Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The use of which had been granted by Panama to the United States in the 1903 treaties.

Now, let me say just a little bit more about this.

Mr. HATCH. Will my friend yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let me say just a little bit more. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator. I am going to be around until 6 o'clock today. I do not want to monopolize the Senate's time, but I shall be glad to answer questions as long as Senators want to ask them.

The Senator from Utah pays me great tribute in asking me questions. I appreciate the questions that have been asked of me.

Mr. HATCH. I have great respect for the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I appreciate the kind of attention that is being given by Senators to what I am saying. I hope it will be as informative to them as it is informative to me to hear their views.

Someone has made reference to the approval given by the representatives of the Panamanian revolution. Dr. Amador, the first President of Panama, objected strenuously—strenuously—to the terms of the treaty. And one member of the delegation actually struck Bunau-Varilla when Bunau-Varilla rushed over to the train station to meet the delegation from Panama that had come down to the train. After Bunau-Varilla had signed the treaty, he rushed over to the train station and there told these representatives of the Panamanian revolution what had happened, what he had done. And McCullough said that one of them was reported to have struck Bunau-Varilla, which indicates to me that they were not too happy with what had been done.

I yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

He said that no Panamanian had signed the 1903 treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No Panamanian signed the 1903 treaty.

Mr. HELMS. I beg to differ with the leader. Let me list the names of those who did sign.

From the junta: J. A. Arango; Tomas Arias; and Manuel Espinosa B.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. What was the date?

Mr. HELMS. December 4, 1903. If the distinguished Senator will indulge me, let us go down the list and thereby pursue it further.

Not only did the three whom I have just mentioned sign it but the Minister of Interior, Eusebio A. Morales, signed it; the Minister of Foreign Relations, F. V. de la Espriella, signed it; the Minister of Justice, Carols A. Mendoza, signed it; the Minister of the Treasury, Manuel E. Amador, the Minister of War and Marine, Nicanor A. de Obarrio, and the Subsecretary of Public Instruction, Francisco Antonio Facio, signed it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is talking about the ratification of the treaty. I am talking about the original signing of the treaty. No Panamanian signed that treaty. Bunau-Varilla and Secretary Hay signed the treaty.

Mr. HELMS. Who designated him, I ask the Senator, to sign it?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I went through that a while ago. Shall I go through it again?

Mr. HELMS. I wish he would. In the meantime, since the Senator is so concerned about a non-Panamanian signing the 1903 treaty I would remind him that Henry Kissinger was not born in this country. And Mr. Kissinger signed the Kissinger-Tack agreement.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon?

Mr. HELMS. Henry Kissinger negotiated for this country, and he was not born here.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Henry Kissinger is a citizen of this country.

Mr. HELMS. Bunau-Varilla could scarcely have become a citizen of a country that came into existence only a few days earlier.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. By the majority leader's argument, I think at least 25 percent of the American people should sign these treaties, because that is about what was the number of Panamanians that signed this treaty.

[Disturbance in galleries.]

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be order in the galleries.

Mr. HATCH. If the Cabinet does not have the right to sign these treaties, who does?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Cabinet did not sign the treaties.

Mr. HATCH. If they did not have the right to approve it, I do not know who did.

Incidentally, in the 1936-55 modifications, which were far more than giving a few water rights and property, I do not know of anybody striking any French citizen or American citizen during those times. They were more than happy to have them.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Senator insists, I refer him to the Background Documents Relating to the Panama Canal, prepared for the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, by the Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress. On page 288, he will find the two signatories listed, John Hay and P. Bunau-Varilla, and their seals.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it not the case that a delegation had come from Panama to discuss the treaty with representatives of our Government, hopefully to sign a treaty, and that they were held in New York—held in New York—by the maneuverings of Bunau-Varilla so he could have the time to rush down and meet with John Hay and sign the treaty.

It is important that the 1903 treaty was signed by a man who had a very special personal financial interest in the provisions of the treaty. There is no question about that. Bunau-Varilla and William Nelson Cromwell, a New York lawyer, who later had a lawsuit with Bunau-Varilla's company over the amount of personal financial interests in the fees that he was entitled to collect, all stood to gain from this treaty in a special personal way.

When the Panamanian delegation held in New York arrived in Washington, as the majority leader stated, and Bunau-Varilla met them at the train station and presented them with the treaty, they went into a state of shock, except for one fellow who maintained enough sensibility to strike him over what he had done.

Subsequently, the treaty was sent down to the Panamanians and, in effect they were compelled to agree to it by the threat that, if they did not do so, they would lose the independence which they had recently gained because the United States would withdraw its protective umbrella.

There is no doubt the Panamanians wanted their independence from Colombia. But there is also no doubt that the Panamanians did not want and were very much opposed to the provisions of the treaty, which Bunau-Varilla drafted himself and then signed, and that they have remained so opposed ever since.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I would yield and yield and yield, but I insist on maintaining my right to the floor and yielding when I get ready to yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask the majority leader this because I am going to have to leave the floor. But before going, I want to make just these brief remarks.

It is easy to stand here on the floor and find objection. We can all find those objections. I do not suppose any one of us would claim that everything is absolutely right just as we see it.

But I would like to remind my colleagues that for weeks our committee held hearing and we heard all of the people who wanted to testify. We made it known that we would welcome them, and patiently we held out. Then our committee made a report that was favorable and incorporated two recommended amendments.

Here is something I want to call attention to because I think it is important. President Carter and General Torrijos had a meeting following the invitation to Western Hemisphere leaders to come to the United States. The Chiefs of State or the foreign ministers of virtually all of the Latin American countries had a big meeting here, and then when the meeting was over they issued a statement in which they laid down certain principles that ought to be observed and expressed their support for these treaties.

I had the feeling at that time that there was general approval among the nations of this hemisphere. We do not often get general approval on such an important issue.

I believe the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Tennessee, both acknowledged that there are people in their respective States who are not in favor of this treaty. That is true down in my State. There has been very strong sentiment expressed in my State.

I have said all along that this issue has been charged with emotionalism and that has had a tremendous influence on public opinion.

I think the Senator from Tennessee made a very fine statement when he reported on the fact that this was not popular all through his State. The Senator from West Virginia has also indicated the same is true in his State.

But I want to call attention to the fact that after hearing 92 different witnesses expressing every viewpoint that I think could be had and spending days and days and days on these treaties we reported them favorably, and the vote in the committee was 14 to 1.

I remind Senators that the Foreign Relations Committee is the committee that has jurisdiction over this question regardless of the interest that any other committees may have. It was the judgment of the Foreign Relations Committee after hearing all of this testimony that the treaties be reported favorably.

Furthermore, we had before us the communique, the joint communique, issued by President Carter and General Torrijos. We incorporated in our recommendations the text of the communique, a communique which when it was first issued was hailed by the people of this country.

I cannot think of any better recommendation for this than the fact that our committee almost unanimously voted in favor of these treaties with the condition that there be written into the Neutrality Treaty the substance of the communique issued by the ruling officials of the United States and Panama.

That is what we recommended and I believe that ought to be carefully considered by the Members of the Senate.

A lot has been said about the 1903 treaty. That was an important treaty at that time, but that is in the past. It is not relevant today. It is historical. Certainly that fact was taken into consideration by those who negotiated the proposed treaties.

I want to say that I do not think any country ever had more dedicated and able negotiators than we had in connection with these proposed treaties. I think great weight ought to be given that in the consideration of them.

I am going to have to leave the floor, but I did want to get in these few comments before leaving.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee for his cogent and pertinent remarks.

Now, may I say that I am not going to yield and yield and yield and yield to the same Senator. It is going to be passed around if I am going to yield.

May I also say I am imposing on the time of the minority leader who is to speak after I finish mine.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Illinois who thus far has not asked me to yield.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I will be speaking later, but I asked the majority leader to yield because I want to have interjected some voice of support.

First, I would like to commend the leadership for scheduling this debate prior to the Lincoln Day recess.

I want to commend Public Broadcasting for making the Senate deliberations on the Panama Canal available to the country so that when we go back home on recess this should be a very high priority topic for discussion.

When we begin to really think through this problem and what the consequences would be, if we do not ratify a new set of treaties, only then do we fully understand the importance of our pending decision.

That is, I think, the question we have to put to those who have formed an opinion in opposition to it. What do we do if we fail to ratify in an acceptable amended form? What consequences will follow?

I merely should like to report that, as I go back now, having taken a position in favor of the amendments that will be offered by this joint leadership and more than 70 Senators, I see the thinking changing in my State of Illinois. People are beginning now to say, "What would we do if we do not support the revised treaties?"

Time after time, I have seen hostile, emotional opposition melt in the face of hard facts. I do not want to interrupt the distinguished majority leader any longer to give some of those facts. I will have an opportunity later in the debate.

However, the most dramatic illustration I had was just the other day, when 150 elected officials representing postal workers from throughout the State of Illinois came down to talk about postal matters. We talked also about the Panama Canal, and at the end of the discussion, I asked for a vote by a show of hands, if they supported the position taken by the Foreign Relations Committee. The vote was 147 to 3 in favor of that position. That vote result never would have occurred a month ago.

So this debate is absolutely essential to have this matter much better understood. I think that by the time we come to the final vote, it will be better understood not only by the Senate but also by the country as a whole.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois for his remarks.

I yield again to my friend from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield for a question.

Mr. HATCH. My question is this: Is it not true, just to put this prior problem to bed. Is it not true that the Supreme Court of the United States has said in Wilson against Shaw, that with regard to the matter of original signatories, "A short but sufficient answer is that subsequent ratification is equivalent to original authority"?

So, regardless of what the emotional argument is, the 1903 treaty is valid.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope I have not been misunderstood to say that the 1903 treaty was not valid.

In pursuance of that point, may I say that, regardless of how many governments there may have been, regardless of how many times the Government of Panama may have changed since 1903, so far as I know, no government of Panama has ever sought to repudiate the 1903 treaty. They all have lived up to it. I have not said it is invalid. That is the point the Senator is making.

Mr. HATCH. The implication is there.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No, the implication is not there. I simply said that the treaty was not signed by any Panamanian.

Mr. HATCH. But the Senator will agree that it is a perfectly valid treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I do not disagree with that.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I think it is enormously useful for us to go into history of the origin of our relations with Panama. It is interesting as a matter of history. It is interesting as a matter of giving us a feel for this whole situation.

But I do suggest that whether the arrangements made with Panama in 1903 and subsequently changed and each change was absolutely valid—assuming that we had every right, that we were not overreaching, that it was a bargain between powers of equal strength and therefore the kind that would be enforced in a court of law if it were a justiciable matter—nevertheless, the question still is, should that be changed now? That is what we really have to decide.

Is it in our interest, is it in the interest of the Panamanians, is it in the interest of the continued operation of the canal and its availability in peace and in war, that this arrangement be changed now? If so is this change a good one?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. Case), the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee, has put his finger on the gravamen of the question.

Mr. CASE. I thank my colleague.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is it in the best interests of the United States to ratify these treaties? That is the question I have made my benchmark from the beginning. Is it in the best interests of the United States for the Senate to lend its advice and consent an approval to the ratification of these treaties?

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

The point that I think is important is that the distinguished majority leader has said time and again that no Panamanian ever signed the treaty.

I call his attention to a most authoritative work. "Cadiz to Cathay," by Duval, on this subject. On page 393 of that monumental work we see this statement:

The signatures were placed on the last page of the treaty in the following order:

Junta Members; J. A. Arango, Tomas Arias, Manuel Espinosa B.

Minister of Interior: Eusebio A. Morales.

Minister of Foreign Relations: F. V. de la Espriella.

Minister of Justice: Carlos A. Mendoza.

Minister of Treasury: Manuel E. Amador.

Minister of War and Marine: Nicanor A. de Obarrio.

Subsecretary of Public Instruction: Francisco Antonio Facio.

That was on December 4, 1903. The U.S. Senate did not give its advice and consent to the treaty until February 23, 1904. So this signed treaty, signed by the Panamanian Government, signed by nine Panamanians, was before the Senate, I assume, from that time on, from December 4, 1903, up to February 23, 1904.

If the Panamanians had wanted to come out from under the treaty, they had ample time to do it. In fact, the treaty was signed by members of the government—nine in all.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alabama has referred to an authoritative and monumental work, and it is, indeed. But there is nothing as authoritative as the original treaty itself, and that convention was signed at Washington on November 18, 1903.

On page 288 of "Background Documents Relating to the Panama Canal," I see two signatures: John Hay, Secretary of the United States, and P. Bunau-Varilla. Two signatures, neither of which is a Panamanian.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama has referred to the subsequent signing by Panamanians—not the signing of the treaty. He is referring to the ratification of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903, and that was done at Panama on December 2, 1903.

There is a difference in signing a treaty and in ratifying it. The treaty we are discussing before the Senate now has already been signed, but it has not been ratified. That is what we are talking about here. It is really a distinction perhaps without a difference, but there is a difference.

We are talking now about treaties—a treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, which already has been signed and was signed last September by the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, and by General Torrijos. By the time that treaty gets around to ratification, there may be different signatures. Who knows? An act of God may create a situation in which there will be different signatures.

I am saying that the original treaty was signed by John Hay and P. Bunau-Varilla, neither of whom was a Panamanian.

If we want to quibble about that, let us continue the quibbling on another day. But there is the record. And what did Bunau-Varilla do?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Three days after the approval of the treaty by the U.S. Senate, he submitted his resignation as envoy extraordinary, and this is what he said:

I had fulfilled my mission. I had safeguarded the work of the French genius.

And who was the French genius? Ferdinand deLesseps.

I had avenged its honor. I had served France.

This was the signatory on the part of Panama—Bunau-Varilla. He had served France, not Panama, not the United States of America. He had served France.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the leader yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Will he yield since he discussed that?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Those were his words. Those were his words. "I had served France."

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will yield further, the Senator makes a point about the treaty being signed only by Bunau-Varilla. The Senator would realize that the American Government did not bring in a whole host of signatories to this treaty and it would have been difficult for the members of the junta there in Panama and the Cabinet there in Panama to have been present in Washington for the purpose of signing the treaty. They were down in Panama representing the Government and the people of Panama. Obviously they could not be up here in Washington to sign it along with Bunau-Varilla.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No. They were on their way from New York.

Mr. ALLEN. They signed it, though, in Panama, signed the treaty on the last page, and I ask unanimous consent that this statement appearing on page 393 of this Duval work be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

The signatures were placed on the last page of the treaty in the following order:

Junta Members: J. A. Arango, Tomas Arias, Manuel Espinosa B.

Minister of Interior: Eusebio A. Morales.

Minister of Foreign Relations: F. V. de la Espriella.

Minister of Justice: Carlos A. Mendoza.

Minister of Treasury: Manuel E. Amador.

Minister of War and Marine: Nicanor A. de Obarrio.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I shall yield to the Senator.

Immediately following the printing in the Record of the extracts from the Duval work, I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record the 1903 treaty as it appears beginning on page 279 and ending on page 288, of the volume background documents relating to the Panama Canal which will show that the convention was signed at Washington on November 18, 1903, by two persons, John

Hay and Bunau-Varilla, and I also ask unanimous consent that the following page 289 which deals with the ratification of that treaty on December 2 and the signatories thereon be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL CONVENTION

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama being desirous to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the Congress of the United States of America having passed an act approved June 28, 1902, in furtherance of that object, by which the President of the United States is authorized to acquire within a reasonable time the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, and the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama, the high contracting parties have resolved for that purpose to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries,—

The President of the United States of America, John Hay, Secretary of State, and The Government of the Republic of Panama, Philippe Bunau Varilla, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, thereunto specially empowered by said government, who after communicating with each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I³

The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE II⁴

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of said Canal of the width of ten miles extending to the distance of five miles on each side of the center line of the route of the Canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea three marine miles from mean low water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific ocean to a distance of three marine miles from mean low water mark with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the said Canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the said enterprise.

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra and Flamenco.

³ Bevans, Treaties and Other International Agreements of the United States of America, 1776-1949, v. 10, pp. 663-672.

³ Art. I superseded by art. I of treaty of Mar. 2, 1936 (TS 945, post, p. 743).

⁴ Art. II modified by art. II of treaty of Mar. 2, 1936.

ARTICLE III

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.

ARTICLE IV

As rights subsidiary to the above grants the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water or water-power or other purposes, so far as the said rivers, streams, lakes and bodies of water and the waters thereof may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the said Canal.

ARTICLE V*

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

ARTICLE VI*

The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any Article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior. All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the said Canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint Commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damage shall be final and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said Canal or the Panama railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages. The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

ARTICLE VII'

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States within the limits of the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors and within the territory adjacent thereto the right to acquire by purchase or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, any lands, buildings, water rights or other properties necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation and protection of the Canal and of any works of sanitation, such as the collection and disposition of sewage and the distribution of water in the said cities of Panama and Colon, which, in the discretion of the United States may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the said Canal and railroad. All such works of sanitation, collection and disposition of sewage and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents or nominees shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewerage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for the payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of fifty years and upon the expiration of said term of fifty years the system of sewers and water works shall revert to and

' Art. VI modified by art. X of treaty of Jan. 25, 1955.

* First sentence of art. VII amended and third paragraph abrogated by art. VI of treaty of Mar. 2, 1936; first paragraph modified and second paragraph abrogated by arts. V and IV of treaty of Jan. 25, 1955. See also agreement of May 18, 1942 (EAS 359), post, p. 809.

become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that water rates may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of said system of sewers and water.

The Republic of Panama agrees that the cities of Panama and Colon shall comply in perpetuity with the sanitary ordinances whether of a preventive or curative character prescribed by the United States and in case the Government of Panama is unable or fails in its duty to enforce this compliance by the cities of Panama and Colon with the sanitary ordinances of the United States the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right and authority to enforce the same.

The same right and authority are granted to the United States for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon and the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in case the Republic of Panama should not be, in the judgement of the United States, able to maintain such order.

ARTICLE VIII

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Company to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties and concessions as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company; but the public lands situated outside of the zone described in Article II of this treaty now included in the concessions to both said enterprises and not required in the construction or operation of the Canal shall revert to the Republic of Panama except any property now owned by or in the possession of said companies within Panama or Colon or the ports or terminals thereof.

ARTICLE IX

The United States agrees that the ports at either entrance of the Canal and the waters thereof, and the Republic of Panama agrees that the towns of Panama and Colon shall be free for all time so that there shall not be imposed or collected custom house tolls, tonnage, anchorage, lighthouse, wharf, pilot, or quarantine dues or any other charges or taxes of any kind upon any vessel using or passing through the Canal or belonging to or employed by the United States, directly or indirectly, in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the main Canal, or auxiliary works, or upon the cargo, officers, crew, or passengers of any such vessels, except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the Canal and other works, and except tolls and charges imposed by the Republic of Panama upon merchandise destined to be introduced for the consumption of the rest of the Republic of Panama, and upon vessels touching at the ports of Colon and Panama and which do not cross the Canal.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to establish in such ports and in the towns of Panama and Colon such houses and guards as it may deem necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade. The United States shall have the right to make use of the towns and harbors of Panama and Colon as places of anchorage, and for making repairs, for loading, unloading, depositing, or transshipping cargoes either in transit or destined for the service of the Canal and for other works pertaining to the Canal.

ARTICLE X *

The Republic of Panama agrees that there shall not be imposed any taxes, national, municipal, departmental, or of any other class, upon the Canal, the railways and auxiliary works, tugs and other vessels employed in the service of the Canal, store houses, work shops, offices, quarters for laborers, factories of all kinds, warehouses, wharves, machinery and other works, property, and effects appertaining to the Canal or railroad and auxiliary works, or their officers or employees, situated within the cities of Panama and Colon, and that there shall not be imposed contributions or charges of a personal character of any kind upon officers, employees, laborers, and other individuals in the service of the Canal and railroad and auxiliary works.

* Art. X modified by art. II of treaty of Jan. 25, 1955.

ARTICLE XI

The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

ARTICLE XII

ARTICLE XIII

The United States may import at any time into the said zone and auxiliary lands, free of custom duties, imports, taxes, or other charges, and without any restrictions, any and all vessels, dredges, engines, cars, machinery, tools, explosives, materials, supplies, and other articles necessary and convenient in the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the Canal and auxiliary works, and all provisions, medicines, clothing, supplies and other things necessary and convenient for the officers, employees, workmen and laborers in the service and employ of the United States and for their families. If any such articles are disposed of for use outside of the zone and auxiliary lands granted to the United States and within the territory of the Republic, they shall be subject to the same import or other duties as like articles imported under the laws of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE XIV ¹⁰

As the price or compensation for the rights, powers and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

The provisions of this Article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

But no delay or difference of opinion under this Article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

ARTICLE XV

The joint commission referred to in Article VI shall be established as follows:

The President of the United States shall nominate two persons and the President of the Republic of Panama shall nominate two persons and they shall proceed to a decision; but in case of disagreement of the Commission (by reason of their being equally divided in conclusion) an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence or incapacity of a Commissioner or Umpire, or of his omitting, declining or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated. All decisions by a majority of the Commission or by the umpire shall be final.

ARTICLE XVI

The two Governments shall make adequate provision by future agreement for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention and delivery within said zone and auxiliary lands to the authorities of the Republic of Panama of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies or misdemeanors without said zone and for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention and delivery without said zone to the authorities of the United States of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies and misdemeanors within said zone and auxiliary lands.

ARTICLE XVII

Canal enterprise, and for all vessels passing or bound to pass through the Canal which may be in distress and be driven to seek refuge in said ports. Such vessels shall be exempt from anchorage and tonnage dues on the part of the Republic of Panama.

ARTICLE XVIII

The Canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by Section I of Article three of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.¹¹

ARTICLE XIX¹²

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the Canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war and supplies.

ARTICLE XX

If by virtue of any existing treaty in relation to the territory of the Isthmus of Panama, whereof the obligations shall descend or be assumed by the Republic of Panama, there may be any privilege or concession in favor of the Government or the citizens and subjects of a third power relative to an interoceanic means of communication which in any of its terms may be incompatible with the terms of the present convention, the Republic of Panama agrees to cancel or modify such treaty in due form, for which purpose it shall give to the said third power the requisite notification within the term of four months from the date of the present convention, and in case the existing treaty contains no clause permitting its modifications or annulment, the Republic of Panama agrees to procure its modification or annulment in such form that there shall not exist any conflict with the stipulations of the present convention.

ARTICLE XXI

The rights and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States in the preceding Articles are understood to be free of all anterior debts, liens, trusts, or liabilities, or concessions or privileges to other Governments, corporations, syndicates or individuals, and consequently, if there should arise any claims on account of the present concessions and privileges or otherwise, the claimants shall resort to the Government of the Republic of Panama and not to the United States for any indemnity or compromise which may be required.

ARTICLE XXII

The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the Canal under Article XV of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse now owned by the New Panama Canal Company and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession, or arising under or relating to the concessions of the Panama Railroad Company or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions which otherwise would belong to Panama at or before the expiration of the terms of ninety-nine years of the concessions granted to or held by the above mentioned party and companies, and all right, title and interest which it now has or may hereafter have, in and to the lands, canal, works, property and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise, and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Company, including any property and rights which might or may in the future either by lapse of time, forfeiture or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions, with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Company, the Panama Railroad Company and the New Panama Canal Company.

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or revisionary interest in or claims of Panama and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Company, shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically secured under this treaty.

ARTICLE XXIII

If it should become necessary at any time to employ armed forces for the safety or protection of the Canal, or of the ships that make use of the same, or the railways and auxiliary works, the United States shall have the right, at all times and in its discretion, to use its police and its land and naval forces or to establish fortifications for these purposes.

ARTICLE XXIV

No change either in the Government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention.

If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other Government or into any union or confederation of states, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such Government, union or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

ARTICLE XXV

For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of the efficient protection of the Canal and the preservation of its neutrality, the Government of the Republic of Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific coast and on the western Caribbean coast of the Republic at certain points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

ARTICLE XXVI

This convention when signed by the Plenipotentiaries of the Contracting Parties shall be ratified by the respective Governments and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington at the earliest date possible.

The Junta of provisional government of the Republic of Panama, considering that there has been signed, by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic accredited to the Government of the United States of America, and the Secretary of State of that Nation, a treaty which copied literally reads as follows:

[Printed ante.]

And considering:

1. That the guaranty of independence for the Republic has been obtained in that treaty.

2. That for reasons of exterior security it is indispensable to take up consideration of the treaty with the utmost celerity, in order that the paramount obligation on the part of the United States may begin to be effectively fulfilled:

3. That by this treaty is realized the aspiration of the people of the Isthmus touching the building of a Canal for the service of the commerce of all nations; and

4. That the Junta of Provisional Government, chosen by the unanimous vote of the people of the Republic, possesses all the powers of the sovereign of the territory.

[SEAL OF THE REPUBLIC OF PANAMA.]

Mr. ALLEN. I merely wanted to point out to the distinguished majority leader—he stated time and time again that no Panamanian ever signed the treaty when without question nine Panamanians representing the Government did sign the treaty on December —

*Foreign Relations of the United States, 1904, pp. 551-552; and Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal, Senate Document 474 (1914), pp. 303-304.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of course, Mr. President—

Mr. ALLEN. Let me finish my statement if I may.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is just a matter of dispute between us.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator dispute the fact that nine Panamanians signed the last page of the treaty on December 4, 1903?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I dispute the fact that nine Panamanians signed the treaty on November 18.

Mr. ALLEN. The last page would not count as part of the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Not as signing. The Senator is talking about the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. No. I am talking about signing the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am talking about the original signing of the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand they were signed here in Washington that way. But still when it was presented to the Panamanians on December 4, 1903, it was signed by the officials of the Panamanian Government.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. For ratification.

Mr. ALLEN. No, not for ratification. It was ratified on December 2.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And signed on November 18.

Mr. ALLEN. It was not approved by the U.S. Senate until February 23, 1904. If there had been any dispute by the Panamanians, there had been plenty of time to reject the treaty and ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Page 289 which—has the Senator completed his statement?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Page 289, which I have had printed in the Record, reads in part as follows:

The junta of provisional government of the Republic of Panama considering that there has been signed—

That there has been signed—by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic accredited to the Government of the United States of America and the Secretary of State of the nation, a treaty—

There you are. The junta in consideration that there has been signed, past perfect tense.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Has been signed.

By whom? Not by any Panamanian. But by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Republic accredited to the Government of the United States of America, Bunau-Varilla who later said "I had served France."

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

Mr. CHURCH. I want to say to the distinguished majority leader that he makes his case from the record. It is no surprise that the junta later acknowledged by their signatures that the treaty had been executed, because anyone familiar with the circumstances of the time will remember that a revolution had just taken place in Panama. The presence of American troops protected the junta whose members had perpetrated the revolution. The presence of American marines in Panama was their shield. They were confronted with one of two alternatives: Either to affix their names to the treaty that had already been signed, or return to Panama and face a Colombian firing squad. Under such dire circumstances, it can hardly be argued with a straight face that the 1903 Treaty was an arms-length transaction. The fact is that the treaty was imposed on the Panamanians. They had to accept. For them, the alternative was even worse than the terms of the treaty. What else could they do but sign?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Government, as the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) has just pointed out, had failed to ratify the treaty immediately, certain persons would have faced the most dire consequences, the most dire consequences, that of facing a firing squad, and the almost certain consequence would have been the suspension of the U.S. protection over the new republic, thus enabling Colombia to regain control.

Seventy-four years ago this month, on February 23, 1904, the Senate approved the treaty by a vote of 66 to 14.

As I have already indicated that treaty was drafted by Bunau-Varilla. He drafted all of the articles of the new treaty in longhand and in English.

And his lawyer and long-time friend, Frank Pavey, corrected the literary imperfections, polished the formulas, and gave them an irreproachable academic form. Here is what Varilla recalled later. He recalled later that, and I quote from McCullough's book again, page 391:

The "indispensable condition of success" was to write a new treaty "so well adapted to American exigencies" that it would be certain to pass in the Senate by the required two-thirds majority. A failure to obtain that two-thirds majority, he was convinced, could still * * *

And that Bunau-Varilla was equal to the task of writing such a new treaty that would be well adapted to American exigencies and that would pass in the Senate by the required two-thirds majority.

We have only to quote from a letter written by Secretary of State Hay to Senator Spooner. This is what Hay said:

The new treaty was "very satisfactory, vastly advantageous to the United States and we must confess with what face we can muster not so advantageous to Panama. You and I know too well how many points there are in this treaty to which a Panamanian patriot could object.

He conceded that the treaty "comes to us more liberal in its concessions to us and giving us more than anybody in this Chamber ever dreamed of having—we have never had a concession so extraordinary in its character as this. In fact, it sounds very much as if we wrote it ourselves."

Well, so much for the writing of the treaty, who wrote it, and to whose advantages it ran.

I yield again to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I want to compliment the distinguished majority leader for laying out in such detail an accurate account of what happened back in 1903. Many of our people are unaware that, prior to the rebellion in Panama, the United States had reached an arm's-length agreement with the Government of Colombia with respect to securing the right to construct the canal across the Isthmus. That treaty had been negotiated in the normal manner, and it called, not for American rights in perpetuity, but rather for a 99-year lease of the Canal Zone.

When we were dealing at arm's length with another sovereign government, and not simply drafting a document to suit ourselves, making it as advantageous as possible, and dictating it to the helpless Panamanian junta, we were willing to settle for a 100-year lease of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And less than a zone 10 miles wide.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, indeed; for considerably less than we arranged for ourselves in the subsequent treaty.

Moreover, the treaty with Colombia was submitted to the Senate and ratified, in 1902. It was rejected by the Colombian Senate in Bogota, for internal political reasons. Thereafter, the rebellion occurred in the isthmus.

The point I wish to make is this: Under the terms of the present treaty, American management of the canal will extend until the end of this century. Only then will the canal be transferred into Panamanian hands. At the end of this century, we will have had control of the Panama Canal Zone for 97 years—just 3 years less than we bargained for when we entered into a bona fide treaty with Colombia, not a puppet government, but another sovereign power.

I do not think we are giving up very much. We were willing in 1902 to settle for 99 years, and under the terms of the pending treaty will exercise control for 97 years. It is not much of a difference.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a short observation?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHURCH. It is not much of a concession, in my view.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator for his comments. I will be glad to yield now to the distinguished Senator from Nevada for the observation.

Mr. LAXALT. I simply wanted to observe that in the context of the 99-year lease situation, that in itself would indicate we did not give up much.

Mr. CHURCH. Correct.

Mr. LAXALT. Since that time, the taxpayers of this country have invested some $7 billion in that facility. That presents a bit of a different picture, because if you are thinking in terms purely of physical assets, now, you are talking about $7 billion, which even in these exotic days is no mean amount as far as the American people are concerned.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank the majority leader. I just could not help but rise in response to the observation of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. GRAVEL. I will have my own statement to present in a moment, but first let me say that $7 billion you alluded to, most of that is defense, the cost of defending the canal for ourselves. The cost of building the canal was preciously small compared to all of that, and we were building the canal so we could use it and get the benefit of it.

The canal has been operated for the past 67 years to the benefit of the consuming nations of the world. So now you are making the allegation that the $67 billion is something we are giving them.

Mr. LAXALT. Seven billion dollars.

Mr. GRAVEL. Maybe the Senator is willing to give us a breakdown of what that is.

Mr. LAXALT. I will be delighted to furnish a breakdown. At the moment I do not have it. In general terms, this value is represented by the investment we have, on a cost basis, bookwise, in the cost of the facilities itself, the canal, and the cost of the basin. I can provide a breakdown of that information later for the edification of the Senate.

Mr. GRAVEL. We will look for that breakdown very shortly, and I think we will have time to go over it in great detail.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Well, there will be other figures presented in that connection. Now, if Senators will indulge me, I would like to complete my remarks, because time is fleeting.

The 1903 treaty has remained the basic document governing the operation of the canal, which was opened in 1913. As the distinguished Senator from Utah has told us, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was subsequently revised by the treaties of 1936 and 1955. A defense site agreement, which would have permitted the United States to retain certain World War II bases within Panama, was unanimously rejected by the Panamanian National Assembly in 1947, following large-scale riots against the agreements.

The Panamanians had long resented the 1903 Treaty and the unusual circumstances under which it was concluded. Over the years, Panamanian criticism mounted. In 1959, and again in 1964, there were serious incidents following protests by Panamanian students. In 1964, 27 persons were killed and more than 400 injured. Panama briefly broke off diplomatic relations with the United States.

On December 18, 1964, President Lyndon B. Johnson announced that the United States and Panama would undertake negotiations for an entirely new treaty concerning the canal. In 1965, President Johnson and the Panamanians announced agreement on negotiating guidelines. Those principles, which were endorsed by former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower—endorsed by former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower; does anyone question their patriotism toward these United States, or their dedication to what they felt was in the best interests of this country? They endorsed those principles, and those principles served as the basis for negotiations which continued through the administrations of President Nixon, President Ford, and now President Carter. They are embodied in the treaties signed September 7, 1977, by President Carter and the Panamanian head of government, General Torrijos. Thus, these basic principles, which I will be discussing in more detail, have enjoyed broad, bipartisan support over a period of 13 years.

So those who write and accuse the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, of being treasonous, those who write accusing Senators of the United States of being treasonous in supporting the treaties, should remember that President Truman, a Democrat, and President Eisenhower, a Republican, endorsed the principles, and President Nixon, a Republican, President Ford, a Republican, and President Carter have all continued these negotiations throughout their administrations. So the negotiations have had broad, bipartisan support over these 13 years, and the approval of the treaties is being given broad, bipartisan support now. This support has been from Presidents and from Senators who, upon entering their oath of office, swore, took a solemn oath under God, to uphold and defend the United States and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, the treaties which are now before us have the same purpose as the resolution approved by the Senate in 1935 and the treaty submitted to the Senate 131 years ago this week by President Polk—opening communications between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through a ship canal, and securing forever the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations on the payment of reasonable tolls.

Our forebears in the Senate demonstrated great wisdom and vision in recognizing the importance of opening a link between the Atlantic and Pacific through Central America. It required many years and a monumental effort before the canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America became a reality.

Just as those Senators of another era acted with remarkable foresight, so did those of a subsequent generation in making the decision to construct the canal.

The treaties before the Senate challenge us to act with equal vision.

With the inclusion of the two amendments I have introduced on behalf of the distinguished minority leader (Mr. Baker), the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee (Mr. Sparkman), the distinguished ranking member of that committee (Mr. Case), the two distinguished whips, (Mr. Cranston and Mr. Stevens), and 72 other Senators, a large bipartisan group, these treaties are, I am convinced, in the long term best interests of the United States. They are the best means of assuring what our Senate forebears sought so long ago—a secure canal connecting the two oceans, open to ships of all nations.

Mr. President, I have held the floor now for a little more than an hour and a half, and I feel out of respect to the distinguished minority leader I should not hold the floor longer today. I have read through nine pages of my prepared text. I am on the 10th page of a text that is 49 pages in length. I have yielded respectfully to others of my colleagues. I do not feel that I should continue with the remainder of my speech today. Out of my regard for the distinguished minority leader, I am about to yield the floor at this time. I shall continue my speech, and shall make the remainder of it, tomorrow, perhaps, or perhaps even after the nonlegislative day period.

I would like, however, at this time, to summarize the major reasons why I support the treaties if the two amendments proposed by the joint leadership are approved.

These treaties represent the product of negotiations conducted under four administrations, Republican and Democratic, over a period of 13 years. That is No. 1.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield on that point for just a moment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. During the course of the Senator's comments, this observation was made, and the point has been made several times around the country, suggesting that because five Presidents have negotiated with varying degrees of intensity, and because it is bipartisan, that perhaps then in the performance of our constitutional responsibilities this body should go along. Is it not true that in accordance with that very same Constitution that the Presidents, whoever they may be, and however many there may be, only have the power to negotiate—only—and that we here in the U.S. Senate, reflecting as best we can within the framework of our consciences and our principles, and reflecting the will of our constituencies, are the only ones with the power to bind? So if there had been 50 Presidents out there attempting to negotiate this treaty, it is of little moment to the Members of this body, because we eventually have the responsibility under the terms of the Constitution to finally make a judgment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is correct. The Senate is not under any obligation, nor is any Senator under any obligation, to support the treaties merely because of the negotiations have been carried forward under the administrations of Presidents represented by both parties. That is not an argument, and I do not propose to make it an argument, for support of the treaties. I simply have said, and I say again, that the treaties represent the product of negotiations that have been conducted under Republican and Democratic administrations so that it cannot be said that these treaties are the product of a Democratic President only, but they reflect the kind of bipartisanship which both parties, throughout the history of those parties, have generally reflected when it comes to foreign policy.

Second, these treaties, in my view, are consistent with the long-perceived interest of the United States. What is that long-perceived interest? A secure international waterway open to neutral access and use in peace and war by the United States and other nations.

So the problem is one that has been given attention by many Presidents and by Congress over a period of 14 years in recognition, I believe, of its being in the long-perceived interest of the United States.

These treaties would assure a climate of good will and understanding which would be conducive to keeping the canal open and accessible to uninterrupted use, thus protecting our long-term economic and diplomatic interests.

As the Joint Chiefs of Staff have repeatedly emphasized, the real strategic value of the canal, from a military standpoint, is in its continued, open, and assured use by the United States.

When I speak of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I speak of those men who, today, have the responsibility for the planning, for the defense and future security of this country—not men who had the responsibility a decade ago or 20 years ago or 50 years ago, but the men who have that responsibility today.

Such use is best guaranteed by ratification of the new treaties, which would result in an atmosphere of cooperation, good will, trust, faith, and mutual respect, rather than confrontation in Panama.

Panama would have a greater stake in the canal and thus a stronger interest in its continued efficient and unimpeded operation. However, the United States would retain a high degree of control over the canal through the end of the century, as well as defense rights thereafter.

All annuity payments to Panama will come exclusively from canal users through tolls—not from tax dollars.

The new treaties will create a climate in which the canal can continue to function as a financially sound public utility, serving not only the United States, but also the entire world.

Ratification of the treaties would be consistent with our own role as a leader among nations. It is particularly important for our relations with Latin America. Rejection, on the other hand, would be seriously detrimental to our economic and diplomatic relations with the nations of this hemisphere and would give new impetus to extremist elements throughout—not only in Panama but in other Latin American countries, and may I include in the democracies of Latin America.

Those extremist groups are still there. They are in Venezuela, they are in Colombia, they are in Costa Rica—the democracies.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. To reject the treaty would give new impetus to those elements, would give ammunition to them so that they could criticize the United States and stir up strife within those countries and attack the governments of those countries.

If I could just finish, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. LAXALT. May I make one observation in the context of the Senator's statement?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator speaks of extremists in these various countries, and I do not think there is any doubt that, as in other countries, they exist in Latin American countries. Is it not also true that there are a great number of extremists within Panama itself—people who may not be willing to take a 23-year siesta, as has been indicated by the rhetoric there but, instead, when these treaties are ratified, will immediately want to take possession of those facilities? Does that not present just as dangerous a situation potentially as the reaction we are going to get from extremists in other Latin American countries?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There are extremists in Panama; there are extremists in the United States of America. There have been extremists in Panama. There always have been extremists in every country. So to say that there are extremists today is nothing new. But I say again that, even though the extremists have been in Panama all these years since 1903 and although their governments have shifted from time to time and changed, not once has Panama, not once has any government in Panama ever attempted to repudiate the 1903 treaty, no matter how ignominious that treaty seemed to be to the Panamanian people.

So I am saying that if these treaties are rejected, we are playing into the hands of those extremists, I say not only in Panama, but also in the democracies of Latin America and in other countries.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for one last time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator is not suggesting that the Senate make a decision that would be responsive to extremist demands, is he?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Oh, of course, not.

Mr. LAXALT. I would hope not, because, in my view, if we in the Senate ever start making policy decisions of the type we may be confronting here shortly to satisfy any extremist group, we are going to be terribly derelict in our responsibilities.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have heard that, Mr. President. That is one of the arguments being used against these treaties, as though we are bowing the knee, bowing the knee to the extremists. There is not any conceivable situation that could arise in Panama if these treaties were rejected, no conceivable situation that could possibly arise in Panama that we could not handle with our military.

Mr. LAXALT. Is that not the case, I ask Senator Byrd—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So why are we bowing the knee? We are not bowing the knee. We are not tucking our tails between our legs and running, because of some fear that there might be a situation arise in Panama that would create a military exigency.

This Senator knows, as I know, that no conceivable situation could arise there that the U.S. military cannot cope with. That is not the question.

Mr. LAXALT. I cannot tell the Senator—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is not the question, but that is the answer that would apply to those would say that those who ratify these treaties are tucking their tails between their legs and running, because they are under threats and that it would be bowing the knee.

Mr. LAXALT. I cannot tell the Senator how delighted I am—may I make an observation?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now the Senator wants to make an observation.

Mr. LAXALT. One last observation.

I cannot say how delighted I am to hear my leader make these observations, because the administration spokesman, like Sol Linowitz, like Mr. Bunker, have gone all over this country and indicated that if we do not ratify, if we reject, we are going to be meeting violence within the country of Panama. If that element is going to be omitted and deleted from our considerations, I think the debate is going to be far more fruitful.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That may very well be true. I do not know what we may be facing in Panama or anywhere else, for that matter. I do not know what we may be facing.

I do not know what we may be facing in West Virginia and Kentucky and the other coal-producing States if the coal contract is not ratified.

Mr. LAXALT. Or if these treaties are ratified.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But I am not using that argument, I say to my friend. General Brown had this to say. I quote from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, page 24:

I think to describe the United States with this action as proof that the United States is a paper tiger, as this gentleman does, is absolutely wrong. I think, rather than that, it shows the United States to be enlightened. I think it shows the United States to be determined to live in the world today and not in the world of yesterday.

Mr. President, the best way to prevent increased Communist influence in the area is to approve the treaties.

Consideration of these treaties goes beyond the specific issue of the Panama Canal to the broader questions of the effectiveness of U.S. foreign policy and this Nation's image in the world. Rejection of the treaties would seriously impair our effectiveness in dealing with other nations and in undertaking important foreign policy initiatives. There can be no doubt that failure to approve the treaties would have serious repercussions for our overall foreign policy.

These are the fundamental reasons why I am convinced that ratification, not rejection, is in the best interests of the United States—militarily, economically, and politically.

Mr. President, as I say, I feel apologetic to the minority leader for taking the time that I have taken. I have attempted to respectfully yield to other Senators as they have sought to ask questions, and this has prolonged my holding the floor. But I owe that to other Senators, and I respect them for it. I feel a sense of pride that they would ask their questions, pride that they are concerned, and I think it all adds to the edification of the American people and to ourselves.

In many instances, such questions have a persuasive impact on my own viewpoint. I try to keep in mind that I can be wrong and that it is the collective—the collective—wisdom of the Senate that counts and not just one's own private personal judgment.

I thank Senators for their patience. I thank all who have contributed to the debate thus far. I apologize to the minority leader and at the same time thank him for his patience in waiting while I have held the floor.

Mr. LAXALT. I believe Senator Allen had an observation.

Mr. ALLEN. I want the distinguished Senator from Tennessee to get the floor and then, if he would be kind enough, to yield to me.

Mr. Baker addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have remarks at some length to make on this subject. But I understand that the distinguished Senator from Nevada has a question he may wish to put, and the Senator from Alabama has asked me to yield to him briefly so that he can respond to certain statements that may have been made yesterday.

I would be happy to do both those things, if I may, in whatever order my colleagues would wish.

I yield first to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the able and outstanding minority leader.

Mr. President, I do wish to answer two points made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) just a moment ago. But before doing so, I want to commend the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) for his erudite, statesmanlike address and for his courtesy in yielding to Senators who might wish to make points contrary to the points being made by the distinguished majority leader.

The distinguished majority leader and I have reached different conclusions as to what is in our national interest as regards the Panama Canal Treaty, but certainly I respect him for the conclusion that he has reached and I respect him further and admire him very much for the very fine address that he has made here in the Senate.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say, if the Senator will yield, that that respect which the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama professes toward me is matched by my respect for him. Never would I question his sincerity of purpose.

I also must say that never have I seen a Member of the Senate who is more dedicated to his people, the people he represents, more dedicated to the Senate itself, more dedicated to its traditions, and more of a gentleman in his treatment of other Senators, than is the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen).

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for those most gracious remarks.

Mr. President, I did want to answer a point made by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), who will in the next year become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee on the retirement of my distinguished senior colleague (Mr. Sparkman).

He made a point that at the end of this century we will have had control of the Panama Canal Zone for some 98 years and that when we were dealing with Colombia, which he referred to as a sovereign state with whom we had arms-length dealings, that we had in the treaty with Colombia provided for a lease of 100 years, that actually we were getting 98 years and why should we complete that turning the canal and the Canal Zone over to Panama.

The distinguished Senator overlooked the fact that the treaty with Colombia, while it did provide for a 100-year term of lease, had a further provision that it was renewable at the sole option of the United States.

So that is a far cry from being merely a certain period of 100 years.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) talked about the fact that Bunau-Varilla had drafted a treaty that was much more favorable to the United States than was the treaty with Colombia that the U.S. Senate approved and Colombia rejected, but he overlooked the fact or did not mention the fact that at that time, at the time of these negotiations with Colombia, the Panamanian route was not the only route that was under consideration.

In fact, in the year 1902, the Hepburn bill had been passed in the House providing for a Nicaraguan canal.

I might say, that canal route was supported by one of my great predecessors in the United States Senate, Gen. John Tyler Morgan, of Alabama, who has been called the father of the Panama Canal.

That bill providing for a Nicaraguan route passed the House by a vote of 308 to 2 and, unquestionably, the sentiment in the country was for the Nicaraguan route.

So it is quite obvious, Mr. President, that something in the nature of competitive bidding must have taken place.

The House and the people of the United States wanted the Nicaraguan route and if the route was to go through Panama, obviously the concessions had to be made that would induce a change in sentiment, a shift in sentiment, from the Nicaraguan route over to the Panamanian route.

So there is no doubt but what the forces recommending the Panama Canal would have offered to make concessions that were favorable to the United States to see that the Nicaraguan route was not followed, so that official opinion and public opinion might shift in favor of Panama.

I did want to point out those two factors in answer to the comments of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

I thank the distinguished minority leader (Mr. Baker) for yielding to me at this time. I am amazed at his good nature in having his opportunity to address this issue be delayed as long as it has. I express my appreciation to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I was delighted to yield to the Senator from Alabama and I am pleased to have his remarks at this time.

Mr. President, I yield now to the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. GRAVEL. I wonder whether the Senator will yield half a moment, in order for me to make an observation.

Mr. BAKER. I had already agreed to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. I have no problem.

Mr. GRAVEL. I just want to juxtapose into the statement made by Senator Allen.

Of course, if the decision was made to go through Nicaragua, with the subsequent earthquakes and volcanic activity, we never would have had a canal.

Second, the Senator is right with respect to the treaty, the Hay-Herran Treaty, but he must remember that it was turned down unanimously by the Senate of Colombia.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, and I am sure the Senator understands why that was turned down. There was a consideration of $40 million involved that they wanted to go to Colombia rather than to the French company, whose franchise had expired.

Mr. GRAVEL. If my colleague will look at the record, he will see that it was turned down over the issue of sovereignty.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will pursue this dispute on someone else's time.

I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I have an observation or two for the record in response to the observations of the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd).

I thank him for his courtesy and cooperation as a leader. To be subjected to as many questions as we subjected him to is the height of patience.

He made observations indicating that military judgment through the Joint Chiefs is not part of the treaty. It is. But it might also be said, as was indicated yesterday, that outside of those presently in military positions in this country, the vast majority of military people, retired and independent, vigorously oppose these treaties.

Second, he stated that the payment of any tax dollars was not going to be required. I think it was amply and clearly demonstrated in the hearings before the Armed Services Committee last week that that is not the case, coming from no less a figure than the Governor of Panama, himself.

The responsibility of the American taxpayer in connection with this treaty is going to be substantial. It is going to amount to millions and millions of tax dollars.

He indicated that there was no problem in connection with the Communist tie in that part of the world. We respectfully disagree. General Torrijos, in remarks and questions to me, indicated that he is a close friend and confidant of no less than Fidel Castro. It is naive of us, as Americans, to think for a moment that if Castro is going to go several thousand miles away to Africa to do the handiwork of the Soviet Union, he will not, if there is a default in the power situation in Panama, travel a few hundred miles with several thousand troops to take advantage of what has been described by our military people as a hemispheric chokepoint.

I thank the minority leader.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. BAKER. I am sorry, I cannot. I would be happy to do so under different circumstances, but I have just been advised by the assistant minority leader that he has to speak before 2 p.m. I have to speak before he does, and I would like to speak at this time, if I may. I apologize to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. President, I thank all those who have participated thus far in this debate. In these 2 days, the Senate already has demonstrated that it retains its prime purpose and principal importance to the scheme of legislative and democratic government in the United States—that is, the opportunity for the Senate to provide a useful forum for the exchange of ideas; to provide for the country a stage on which the adversary positions of men and women of good will can be tested and compared; and to illustrate to the rest of the country that out of this adversary relationship comes neither anger nor disunity, but rather, a better legislative product.

In that view, I urge my colleagues, and indeed the entire country, to understand that in this debate, over such a divisive and emotional issue, the Senate is doing precisely what the Founding Fathers intended and what it does best in terms of the relevant needs of the country. The Senate is providing an opportunity to synthesize the best ideas, to test the best judgments, and to formulate the best policy for the future national security interests of the United States.

I would be the last to claim—indeed, I never have claimed—that all the wisdom on this issue is on one side or the other. Not only is the question of advice and consent to the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties a divisive issue; it is a close issue. Men and women of good will are still on both sides of this question and no doubt will be on both sides of it after we conclude our determination, make our judgment as a Senate, and certify our decision to the President in terms of our consent or the withholding of that consent to the ratification of these treaties.

However, I think the country will be best served by understanding that it is the function and the responsibility of the Senate to hear, to understand, to test, and to judge the differing points of view, not only in the country but more particularly in this Chamber.

I say at the very outset that I have nothing but the most profound respect for every Member of this body and for their points of view and that I will consider each of them separately.

In my own case, I already have announced to the people of Tennessee, on Tuesday night, that it is my judgment that the new treaties, with certain amendments that have now been offered by the distinguished majority leader and me, are in the best national security interests of the United States. I will explain why I think so and even a little of how I arrived at that decision. But before I do, I should like to say a little about the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. Scott) at the very beginning of the debate today.

I asked the majority leader to yield to me only long enough to say that the sensitivity of one who is a candidate for reelection is probably greater than that of anybody else who was involved in that colloquy, and I was the only candidate involved. I know firsthand the difficulty of making a decision on this issue under those circumstances.

Mr. President, without trying to assume or play the role of a moral giant, which I am not, or to lay claim to intellectual superiority and insight, which I do not, it may serve some purpose to give some insight into how one who is under the gun—that is, up for reelection in 1978—in fact judged this issue, before I turn to an analysis of the question itself.

To begin with, this is not a new issue. Other speakers, yesterday and today, have remarked on the fact that the matter of revisions of our treaty arrangement with the Republic of Panama have been the subject of conversations at various levels since the administration of President Eisenhower and, actually, before that. This matter was actively pursued in the administrations of President Johnson and each succeeding President, Republican and Democrat. It is not like the cartoon I saw in a magazine the other day that showed two men standing at a bar, and one said, "You know, I have not thought about the Panama Canal in 30 years, and suddenly I find I cannot live without it." This is not a new issue. It has been around for a long time. It simply had not been the high-pitched, emotional issue that it has become in recent years.

I think that the intensity of the emotion and the extent of the public campaign in support of or in opposition to the treaties, does not relate to their importance in terms of our perception of national issues but rather to another factor—and that is that in this age of instantaneous communications and almost instantaneous transportation and at a time when the population is better educated and more aware than at any other time in the history of the country, there is a more active concern for the major issues that confront the country. Therefore, I judge the importance of this event in terms of the public's participation in it.

I do not resent that there have been extraordinary letter-writing campaigns, newspaper advertisements, and, in fact, the utilization of all the modern media to try to bring to bear the point of view of one party or the other. I am speaking now of people, not political parties. I think it is a good thing, because it verifies the fact that America, even now, is still maturing into its full role as a self-governing republic. It is uncomfortable for those of us who are running for reelection to have 40,000 letters pour into the mail room, with less than 30 staff members trying to handle them. I say again, to anyone who has not received an answer, just bear with me. It takes a while.

Mr. Stevenson assumed the Chair.

Mr. BAKER. It always causes a concern to pick up a paper in Nashville, Tenn., and see a full page ad in a Sunday edition that says "Only Howard Baker can save the Panama Canal." It never dawned on me that only Howard Baker could save the Panama Canal. Moreover, the ad said, "Write, call, or visit." My wife asked: "Which one do you think they will do?" I said: "Probably all three." And they have.

But I welcome that as well because it is an extension of the public participation in a great national debate. It, likewise, caused a bit of consternation to go to a University of Tennessee football game in that magnificent stadium in my hometown of Knoxville that seats 102,000 people, which is almost as big as the city, and to see an airplane fly over at halftime saying: "Contact Senator Baker. Save the Panama Canal."

So when my friend from Virginia (Mr. Scott) suggested that this was a matter of particular interest to the people who might stand for reelection in 1978, all I can tell him is that he "ain't seen nothing yet." I have been there and I know what it is about. I have visited with the American Legionnaires who talk in earnest about this matter and who listen patiently to my attempt to analyze the issue carefully and dispassionately for them.

Mr. President, even with that experience and with the sensitivity that I have to my own political fortunes, I would not presume to tell you or any of my colleagues what the country thinks about this issue. I rather suspect that the country wants us to help them decide what to think about this issue. I suspect that the polls recently taken indicate that most people instinctively oppose new treaties with the Republic of Panama, but with certain amendments and additional guarantees a majority probably support new treaties with the Republic of Panama. I would not presume to stand here on this floor and tell you that the American people think so and so. I can tell you what my judgment is and I have done so.

I believe that the judgment of the sovereign, the people of this country, is still to be made and that this debate may have a significant part to play in that judgment.

Parenthetically, Mr. President, I commend the majority leader for agreeing to broadcasts from the floor of the Senate. I had rather hoped that this debate might be televised as well, because I think electronic access to the Senate itself is a logical next extension of the public galleries. If the people of this country are to participate fully and meaningfully in the deliberations of their Government and if we are, in fact, to march together with the collective judgment of the sovereign, electronic communications from this Chamber will be very helpful and a good first step.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the sensitivity I feel for this issue. It is sort of like being, if my friend from Nevada will pardon the expression, a Las Vegas gambler. I feel sometimes you are betting every chip you have on this because this issue is a killer issue politically.

It may devour you, or you may survive it, but you cannot profit from it politically. No way.

Mr. President, all that does is make the issue more difficult. It does not shed any light on our determination. It makes it more uncomfortable. It does not facilitate the decision. It makes it more unpleasant, but it does not alter the facts.

Against that background of acute political distress, let me tell you how one Senator arrived at his decision. First, I know the majority leader will forgive me if I say that while we arrived at the same judgment on the desirability of amending these treaties by Senate action, and ratifying them as amended, I believe we arrived at that judgment, in part at least, by different routes. For instance, I do not think the 1903 treaty was a bad treaty. I think it was good for Panama and good for the United States, and I am proud of the canal that came as a result of it. I believe the pride that it has brought to the United States is well justified.

But that is not the point.

The point is—I did not negotiate that treaty, and I refuse to accept a burden of guilt for someone else who did. I must take the facts as I find them. And I judge them on the basis of what will best serve the national security interests of this country in the future, not by what happened in the past. Some may say, "Oh, the insensitivity of that."

I am not insensitive, and I have a compassionate concern for the plight of the Panamanian people, then and now. But my official sworn responsibility as a U.S. Senator is to look to the future of the United States. My judgment must be made not on whether it was a good treaty then, but whether it is a good treaty now; and, whether that treaty agreement should be changed.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, this political odyssey began in August 1977, when I was in Tennessee during the period that the Senate was not in legislative session. I was enjoying an opportunity to travel about my State, even to visit with my family a little, and as I recall it was early one afternoon when I picked up the telephone and the operator said "Senator Baker, the President wants to speak to you."

The President came on the line to tell me that negotiations with Panama were about complete and that he wanted me to know of this in advance. The President also said that he hoped that the treaty could be submitted to the Senate immediately and that we could have early on that treaty in 1977.

I am sure the President will not be offended if I repeat now my reply in substance. I try to make it a policy not to repeat conversations in which only Presidents and I are present, but I think this is important and I believe the President would not judge it a mistake to deviate from that personal policy.

I thought for a minute and replied:

Mr. President, I am sure you know as certainly I know that this is an issue that will generate strong emotions, that will divide my State, the country, and indeed divide my party and your party, too. One only has to recall that extraordinary contest in the Republican Presidential primary in 1976 when this was certainly one of the principal issues in the campaign between President Ford and Governor Reagan, to know that it is going to be divisive. It is going to be difficult. And I must say, Mr. President, that I want you to know that I will consciously make the decision not to decide how I will vote during this year, and that I will wait until after the first of January to make that determination because I want to make certain that I fulfill my responsibilities as a Senator to my State and as minority leader to my party in the Senate.

I believe the President understood my point of view. When I returned to Washington I discussed the matter with the distinguished majority leader, and as a result he and I cosigned a letter to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, chaired by Senator Sparkman, of Alabama, and on which the senior Republican, the ranking minority member, is Senator Case of New Jersey. The essence of the letter was: We want the Foreign Relations Committee to hold the most extensive hearings. We want you to take your time. We want you to provide a forum for everyone on every side of the issue to be heard. We will cooperate with you as majority leader and minority leader in seeing that you have all the time you need to meet, and would encourage you to meet even after the Congress adjourns sine die so that the Senate will be in a position after the Congress reconvenes in January to proceed to consideration of these treaties.

The Foreign Relations Committee did hold extensive hearings, and did hear a wide variety of testimony on every conceivable side of the issue. The report of the Foreign Relations Committee is voluminous and extensive indeed.

Following the hearings, Mr. President, if I may take just a little more of the time of my colleagues to describe how I arrived at my decision, the Congress adjourned sine die in December. There was an opportunity to return to Tennessee once more, to spend Christmas there, and to ponder on what had gone before, to try to understand this avalanche of information and contradictory testimony, to consider the views represented in the briefs and position papers submitted by two expert consultants that I had employed in my office as minority leader—one for the treaties and one opposed—and decide whether I had done all I needed to do to make a wise and reasoned judgment that would fully respond to my duties as a Senator and to my party in the Senate.

In December, I decided that the treaties did not meet the requirement that the future interests of the United States be fully protected, and that there was ambiguity in the neutrality treaty that I felt had to be dealt with. I had previously the privilege of visiting at the White House with President Carter. President Carter indicated then that he hoped to have a memorandum of understanding with General Torrijos to clarify articles IV and VI of the neutrality treaty.

I told the President that I would encourage him to do that—at that time the proposed memorandum of understanding was in the form of a letter—and I urged him to try to get General Torrijos to sign the letter. However, I also told him then that I did not think that a memorandum of understanding between President Carter and General Torrijos would suffice, that I thought that the matter had now moved to the Senate, that the Senate had an obligation under article II of the Constitution, and that, while a memorandum of understanding was desirable, I thought it did not meet the need for mandatory action by the Senate.

That was my final judgment. I decided there needed to be further amendments to the neutrality treaty before we turned to the consideration of the canal treaty itself, keeping in mind, of course, that unlike the 1903 arrangement, where there was one treaty—there are two in this case—the canal treaty and the neutrality treaty.

The question arose, what would the President of the United States say about the submission of such amendments? What would the Republic of Panama say? Would they reject the amendments? This was important because amendments require the formal concurrence of the other government. Was it or was it not worthwhile to try? What would the other countries of Latin America think? Mexico, for instance, or Colombia or Venezuela? In two or three of those countries, there is at least the possibility that a sea-level canal might be built. There is a provision in these treaties that the United States will not build a future canal anywhere except in Panama. What would these other Latin American countries think about amendments with respect to the sea-level canal?

Shortly after the first week of the new year it was my privilege to travel, in the company of two other Senators, pursuant to an authorizing resolution of this Senate, to Panama and to other countries, to ascertain their views. The distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. Garn) and the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Chafee) accompanied me on that trip.

Mr. President, to abbreviate this chronology, I would like to say that on meeting with General Torrijos in Panama, I told him that I felt that our best interests, his and mine, would be served by absolute candor and frankness, and that I wanted him to know that the treaties in their present form, unamended, in my judgment had absolutely no chance of passing the United States Senate. If he was amenable to amending the treaties, I would like to know that before I decided whether it was worth while to ask the Senate to work its will, in the amendatory process, to change them.

Our delegation, Mr. President, met twice with General Torrijos and a number of other government officials, both military and civilian, and the net result was that in my judgment General Torrijos indicated that the Government of Panama was ready to consider certain amendments, that they would not object to them, and that a satisfactory package of amendments on additional guarantees might be put together that would have some chance of passing the Senate, as contrasted to the treaties unadorned, which, in my view, had no chance of prevailing.

Having reached that decision, I made an announcement in Panama that I would return to Washington and try to put together such a package of amendments; and, I did. The result of that, Mr. President, was the joint initiative of the distinguished majority leader and 77 other Senators, including me: a joint leadership effort and a bipartisan effort to put these treaties in shape so that they were consistent with the requirement that they serve the undoubted national security interests of this country, and so that they would have some reasonable chance of passing this Senate.

It is still uncertain whether the treaties, as amended, can pass this Senate. That is what this debate is all about. This is one of the few cases where the Senate will decide the issue on the basis of the debate. It is not a charade. What is going on here will probably determine the outcome.

But I was pleased that we were able to get that number of cosponsors. I think it augurs well, not only for the future of the treaties but also the spirit of this body, because it showed that although Members disagreed on the final outcome, many of them wanted to work together to try to improve the submission before the Senate.

I look around the Chamber and see the distinguished Senator from Utah, the distinguished Senator from Nevada, the distinguished Senator from Indiana—and there are others here—who cosponsored that amendment. I am certain that some of those I have named may not be entirely convinced that they should vote for the treaties, but I think the fact that they cosponsored the amendment signifies a healthy and wholesome attitude in the Senate, that is, that the Senate will work its will to improve the documents, and then make final judgment on what the outcome should be.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the distinguished minority leader yield for one observation at that point?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I will.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I had the experience, and I am sure the distinguished minority leader had the same experience, in talking with some Senators about those amendments, that some Senators told me they would support the amendments, but for various reasons they did not want to cosponsor them. So actually the support of the amendments will be greater than is reflected by the 78 sponsors and cosponsors thereon.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the majority leader. I had, indeed, the same experience, and I was doubly grateful for the cooperation and indeed the assistance of Senators who do not favor the treaties at this point, in trying to improve them according to the suggestions contained in those amendments.

Mr. President, I do not want to state this next set of facts without great care. I want my colleagues to fully understand that while the Panamanian Government indicated to my satisfaction that they would support such amendments and would not object to them, it is still, as far as I know, the position of the U.S. administration that they do not favor amendments. I cannot say that the administration will favor them. I can only say that it is my best judgment that if the Senate works its will and does, in fact, amend the treaties, they will not be objected to by the administration. I want that carefully understood. I do not have that representation at present, but I have a strong view that the administration will not object if the Senate decides to work its will and, in fact, to amend these treaties.

Following that point, Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations to express his point of view as that committee began proceedings which would lead to the reporting of the treaties to this body for its consideration. At his request, and at mine, the Foreign Relations Committee did not amend the treaties, but rather, made only recommendations for amendments. That was not to short circuit the Committee on Foreign Relations, but because we believed that every Member of the Senate should have an opportunity equal to that of members of the Foreign Relations Committee to participate in deliberations. After all, the Senate now in a special procedure, sitting as the Committee of the Whole, is the functional equivalent of the Foreign Relations Committee and has general jurisdiction of the subject matter as a committee. Therefore, I was particularly pleased that the committee accepted the judgment of the majority leader, in which I concurred, that the maximum opportunity for those for and against the treaties would be afforded by reporting the treaties to the floor without amendments, but, rather, with suggestions.

I think that was borne out by the fact that 76 people did participate in cosponsoring the amendments Senator Byrd and I suggested, whereas in the Foreign Relations Committee no one but the members could have participated. The amendments would have appeared here as committee amendments rather than Senate amendments. I pay special tribute to the Foreign Relations Committee for doing that because, while it did not diminish their stature, it did accommodate the greater need of a greater number of Senators in this Chamber.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I want to say that I believe the procedure suggested by the majority leader and supported by the minority leader was an extremely constructive procedure to follow in this instance. The minority leader is correct that the committee did not actually amend the treaties but it did adopt positive recommendation with respect to amendments which should be offered and which the majority and minority leaders had presented.

It was my view, shared obviously by the committee, that this was a constructive way in which to proceed, and that it would give maximum opportunity to the Members of the Senate to work their will in respect to this very important matter.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for his comments, and for his help in the committee in dealing with the issue there, and in supporting this method of bringing it to the floor for the consideration of this body as a Committee of the Whole. I appreciate his remarks.

Mr. President, I would like now to turn to the reasons why I believe the amended treaties best serve the national security interests of the United States.

I followed with great interest the colloquy just held between the distinguished majority leader, Senator Byrd, and the equally distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt), about whether we were bending our knee as a nation to the threat of terrorists. I would like to state my views without any association with either point of view. I simply want to state my views on this subject.

I believe the United States of America can operate that canal come what may.

I think every Member of this body, and the President of the United States, would do whatever was necessary to see that that canal stayed open and available for shipping and military purposes, whether these treaties are amended or not. I just happen to think it is going to be a lot easier to try to keep the Panamanians as our friends and allies than it is to convoy ships through the canal.

I just happen to think it is going to be better to try to accommodate the purposes of 1978 instead of clinging to the status quo.

I believe, Mr. President, that the 1903 treaty was a good treaty then but I do not think it is a good treaty now.

I do not think the United States should approve these treaties out of fear of another Vietnam, because I do not believe there will be another Vietnam in Panama.

In traveling to Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, and Colombia, I asked in each case what would happen if these treaties were rejected. Would there be assistance and aid from adjoining countries? Would there be a supply line to Panama as there was into Vietnam? The answer was, "Of course not."

I do not believe for one instant that terrorist activities or student activities in Panama could keep the United States from using and enjoying that great waterway. It might be necessary to reinforce our garrisons there, but if it is we will just do it.

However, I think there is a better way, Mr. President. The better way is with revised treaties, extending in perpetuity our right to defend that canal in its utilization and neutrality, and our right to use it in time of war against anyone else, even including Panamanians, forever.

Some say, Mr. President, that by doing this we are giving away the canal. On the contrary, Mr. President, if these treaties are ratified, as amended, we will have more rights to defend the Panama Canal after the year 2000 than we have at any other defense establishment anywhere else in the world—more than in Spain, in Greece, in Turkey, in England, or anywhere. We will have more permanent rights, more extensively held, in relation to the defense of the canal than anyplace else in the world.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. While it may be admitted that that may be the case in relation to our bases elsewhere, the Senator is not contending for a moment that we will have more rights after we give up this canal in its protection and operation.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator from Nevada is entirely right. That is one of the factors we have to take account of in making the balancing judgment. Certainly, we will have less rights after the year 2000 than we have now, but we will have more rights after the year 2000 than at any other military establishment anywhere else in the world, except those in the United States.

This points up, Mr. President, this very pertinent inquiry by the Senator from Nevada, the nature of the difficulty in arriving at these decisions. There is no clear-cut answer to this. Do we need greater rights than I have described? Do we need the rights we have now or even more rights than we have now in case of a world challenge in the future? I do not know.

All I can do is bring forth my very best judgment and decide, on balance, what is best for the country. Men can honestly differ on that point. It is a good point.

Mr. President, that brings me to the last point I would like to make. There is a section of the report on my trip to Latin America entitled "What Will the Neighbors Think?"

To summarize briefly, Mexicans think if a sea-level canal is built they may want to build it. In fact, I suspect that they are more interested in natural gas problems right now than they are in the Panama Canal.

The Colombians, on the other hand, have every right to be a little resentful. We may have, indeed, facilitated the loss of the Panama province. But I found no recrimination or bitterness in their attitude. I found instead that they are greatly concerned about the perpetuation of their rights to free passage of Colombian ships through the canal.

I found in Venezuela that there was a great concern for the unrest, the distress, and the political difficulty that might occur if the treaties were not ratified, particularly in terms of future encroachments by unfriendly powers such as Castro's Cuba.

I heard in Brazil a statement that America is a great power but it will not solve all of its problems in Latin America with the Panama Canal treaties. I would urge my colleagues to understand that. We are not going to solve every problem in Latin America with these treaties whether we approve them or do not approve them.

We have big problems with Brazil and I urge the administration to face them because they are problems of major consequence. Brazil has an economy that is growing so fast that in a few years its GNP, its population, and certainly its national pride may rival that of the United States. We have to put our house in order with Brazil.

Their general view is, "You ought to have the treaties but that does not solve all your problems. That is just an installment along the way."

I suspect this is probably right.

Mr. President, the President of Venezuela, who is an articulate, ebullient, capable politician, a great administrator, and magnificent host—we stopped at Caracas for 6 hours on the way back and spent a productive 4 hours with him in nonstop conversation—is most persuasive.

I asked this question, and I think it has a telling impact:

What would happen if some years in the future another head of government in Panama decided that Torrijos had done such a good job and made so much political hay out of new treaties with the United States, "Why don't I do it one better and negotiate that treaty again? Why don't I try to accelerate the day of the Panamanian take-over from 2000 to the year 1990, for instance?" It is a pretty good political issue in Panama.

The President of Venezuela said, and I am grateful to him for saying it, that if the United States does, in fact, negotiate satisfactory new treaties with the Republic of Panama, he will insist, as will, in his view, all Latin American countries, and even support the United States in the insistence that the treaties be fully performed according to their terms.

Mr. President, I close by saying, once again, that this is a close issue and a close call. I have indicated to my friends on this side of the aisle, on both sides of the question, that I wish to be of service to them in seeing that we have a meaningful and thorough debate. And I will do that.

Not only will future unity in this country be served by that, but significant debate on a close and important issue in the Senate go a long way toward the growth of our ability to govern ourselves intelligently at a time when we are better suited to it than ever before; at a time when the American Congress is more relevant to this era than ever before; at a time when our population is better educated and more aware than ever before; and at a time when our greatness has just begun.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think the Senator has made a magnificent statement, very forthright, very frank, giving his reasons for his support of the treaty with the amendments. May I say, as one of those who did not believe that the amendments were necessary, I believe the treaty says exactly what Senator Baker says it says. The purposes and intentions of the United States, it seems to me, are very clear. I do not know how many of us will be here in the year 2000, but I think our national purpose will be observed. I think we can proceed with confidence. But I also agree with Senator Baker that if this is what is required to reassure 67 Members, then it should be done.

I think that the people in Panama have shown an extraordinary discipline, considering their deep national feeling on this subject, by voting 2-to-1 for this treaty. It was made clear to them that the substance of these amendments would be made a binding agreement. They could easily have taken offense on the ground that we were just belaboring the obvious. But the Panamanians are anxious for a settled course, which we are laying out with them in these treaties. I hope very much that these great purposes which is our objective can be served by the approval of the treaty with these amendments.

Mr. President, may I say, too, that I have the deep wish that those who so sincerely oppose the treaties—and I know Senator Laxalt is one who can be relied on to feel that way—will be gratified with us if it works out the way we think it will work out when we cast our votes.

Mr. DOLE. Will the distinguished minority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole).

Mr. DOLE. Let me say, first of all, that I appreciate the statement of my friend, the minority leader. I know it was a very difficult decision that was made.

I will say, as I indicated yesterday to Senator Byrd, that there may be others of us who will cosponsor the amendments, having originally sponsored the amendments as early as last September, and I assume we are not precluded from that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I must say that the Senator from Kansas is exactly right. As far as I know, he was the first one to make these suggestions in virtually this form. I am grateful to him personally for taking those initiatives and he would be most welcome as a cosponsor.

Mr. DOLE. I think the second question is—and I know it has been very difficult. There are some political overtones. I have read about what will happen to Senator Baker and Senator Dole, what will happen to the treaties. We are all aware of that. But I think the Senator from Tennessee has addressed the question in the proper way. Our responsibility is to the American people, not to a political party. Our responsibility is to make a determination. And it is a very close call, as the Senator from Tennessee has indicated.

I guess the Senator from Kansas, having made some suggestions and having still others to suggest during the course of the debate, would hope, and he has no reason not to hope, that the distinguished minority leader, as well as the distinguished majority leader—because I know both men struggled mightily with the decision. It is not an easy decision. As the distinguished majority leader said earlier, if we took a poll, it would be a very easy decision. But we are called upon to do more than tabulate.

I commend both the leaders for arriving at that decision. I may not agree with it totally, but I agree with it. They have struggled and they have tried and they have made their decision.

I guess the question, then, is if other amendments are offered that have merit and that would improve the treaties in the interest of this country and the Republic of Panama, would the minority leader be in a position to support those amendments?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Or are we being told that this is it, that we will have the two amendments to the neutrality treaty and that is all?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kansas' question is a good one, as his questions always are. I can only answer for myself. The agreement to cosponsor the two amendments between the majority leader and me did not carry any obligation not to cosponsor any other amendments. It is my view that Senator Byrd probably will not, but I have not precluded that.

I must say in all candor, however, that I do not plan to support any amendment that would change materially the shape and the form of the treaties. For instance, I would not support an amendment that would change the date for transition. If it does not fundamentally change the shape and form of the treaties, then I would willingly consider not only amendments but, reservations and understandings that might also be helpful.

I might say that I have talked to a number of other Senators on this side who have a range of understandings that they wish to suggest in aid of interpretation of other parts of the treaty. Frankly, I have encouraged them to so proceed. So my answer to the Senator from Kansas is that this is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposition as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DOLE. I thank my distinguished colleague and emphasize that there may be differences, and there are very close differences. I think there are probably six to eight Senators—I cannot name them. I guess out of 100, there may be 6 or 8, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, who may be impacted by the debate. It seems to this Senator that, as we consider amendments, that is all we can ask, that they be considered as being responsible and well motivated, and offered in an effort to improve the treaties.

I thank my distinguished leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas.

I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader for yielding.

I ask unanimous consent that Richard McCall, and Al Saunders of Senator Humphrey's staff be granted the privilege of the floor during Senate consideration of resolution and ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. Stevens addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield just briefly, I want to compliment the distinguished minority leader on his eloquent presentation that I have just listened to and congratulate him for the process by which he evolved his decision. It was a long one. It was a difficult one for him, and, as a Senator who is running this year, he is in a situation that, thankfully, two-thirds of the Members of the Senate are not in.

So I congratulate him and I applaud him for his courage and forthrightness in wrestling with this decision and for his fine statement.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I now thank the Senator from Alaska for indulging my comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from West Virginia, the distinguished majority leader, for his comments. I, too, want to commend Senator Baker, our minority leader, for his statement and for his very clear definition of his position and how he arrived at it.

I am one of those who is opposed to the treaties as they are now presented. I have stated that there are amendments that I feel must be adopted if these treaties are to reflect the best interests of the United States.

If the amendments are adopted, I will reconsider my opposition to the treaties. I believe it is possible for many of us to be satisfied with the terms of the treaties if the Senate is willing to make the changes that are necessary in order to deal with the reservations and fears we have concerning the text of the treaties as they now stand.

Mr. President, I am sending to the desk a technical amendment to the amendment of the majority leader and the minority leader, amendment No. 21, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 30

Insert at the end of amendment No. 21 the following:

"In accordance with Annex A to this treaty the term "auxiliary vessel" shall be deemed to mean, any ship, not a vessel of war, that is owned, operated, or otherwise engaged in the carriage of military and nonmilitary government cargoes by or for a state and used, for the time being, exclusively on government non-commercial service. This is intended, and it shall be so interpreted, to insure that vessels which are chartered or leased by a state, irrespective of the type of charter or lease, are considered to be "auxiliary vessels".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my amendment clarifies the definition of "auxiliary vessel" in order the vessels chartered or leased by the United States, vessels which carry the bulk of our military and nonmilitary Government cargoes, will receive head-of-the-line passage in the event of an emergency. The present definition of "auxiliary vessel" incorporated into the Treaty Concerning the Permanent, Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal through annex A fails to adequately insure this.

In order for a vessel to receive head-of-the-line preference, it must be either a "vessel of war" or an "auxiliary vessel" of a state. "Auxiliary vessel" of a state is defined in annex A to the treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal as a vessel that is owned or operated by a state. This poses a substantial problem for the United States, 97 percent of whose bulk cargo and 82 percent of whose petroleum cargo travels on civilian vessels under charter by the United States.

Under the traditional rule of international law, military charters and leases are considered Government-operated vessels. This doctrine, however, has been substantially eroded. A growing number of third-world nations now refuse to recognize Government-chartered vessels as operated by a state and to grant those vessels appropriate privileges. The incidents involving Military Sealift Command-chartered vessels have occurred not only in third-world nations, but nations of the industrialized world as well. A recent incident occurred in Okinawa where local customs officials refused to recognize an MSC-chartered vessel as operated by the United States.

The U.S. Coast Guard subjects vessels that are leased or chartered to the U.S. Government and operated by commercial operators to numerous Coast Guard regulations related to inspection and manning requirements including the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, the Dangerous Cargo Act, and the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act to which Government vessels are not subject.

My technical amendment which affirms the intent of the framers of this document unequivocally affirms the traditional rule of law and insures that vessels chartered or leased by the United States will be classified as auxiliary vessels. The erosion of the traditional doctrine of International Law governing charter mandates this amendment.

In the past 15 years there have been numerous changes in traditional doctrines of international maritime law, some of which have been of substantial benefit to the United States—such as the implementation of 200-mile fishery conservation zones.

I would point out to my colleagues in the Senate that the Soviet merchant fleet will not have this problem. Whenever the Soviets choose to carry military cargoes they are always on-board Government-owned and operated vessels since their entire fleet is Government-operated. Unlike the Soviet counterparts, chartered or leased auxiliary vessels of the United States not recognized as auxiliary vessels for purposes of this treaty could be subject to safety inspections, search, and surveillance as a condition of transit. This could cause undue delay. It would be the height of irony if in a logistics emergency we were unable to resupply our military needs as fast as the Soviets because of our heavy reliance upon civilian vessels chartered by the United States for the carriage of our military cargoes.

Further, such vessels could be made to disclose their port of origin, destination, and cargo. Disclosures of this nature could be antithetical to U.S. security interests during a military operation. We should at the least require that this treaty put us on equal parity with the Soviet maritime fleet.

Mr. President, I have consulted closely with academia in the development of this position. Prof. Richard Baxter of the Harvard Law School, an internationally renowned specialist in this field who has been working with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and who has testified before them on the canal treaties, agrees with my analysis of the "auxiliary vessel" definition. Professor Baxter is sending a letter to that effect which has been slowed down as a result of the blizzard presently inundating the New England area.

Mr. President, I believe in order for the Senate to fully understand the importance of this amendment, it would be helpful if a detailed description of the Military Sealift Command was presented. I would like to cover some of the highlights of the MSC mission, its organizational structure, and its operations. I also will note the resources the MSC has at its disposal and describe the manner in which those resources are managed. The Military Sealift Command is a unique organization which is a military unit, though its principal carriers are civilian vessels. It is a Navy command, staffed largely by a civilian work force.

MSC roles are both complex and varied. The MSC has a close relationship with all major elements of the Department of Defense, with the other single manager transportation operating agencies, and with a variety of civilian and Federal agencies. In 1949, the Department of Defense designated the Secretary of the Navy as single manager for DOD sealift, and directed that a sealift operating agency be established by the Navy. The MSC commander is the executive agent for the Secretary of the Navy and commands the Navy operating agency for sea transportation—the Military Sealift Command.

The MSC has supported U.S. force deployments in varied parts of the world in each decade since World War II. In the 1950's following the end of the war in Korea, MSC cargo carriage declined. It began to expand about 1961, and reached a peak in 1969. In that 1 fiscal year, MSC moved more than 30 million measurement tons of dry cargo worldwide. Half of that volume was delivered to South-east Asia. It is important to note that MSC dry cargo lifts in fiscal years 1974 through 1977, were below the previously low volume—in fiscal year 1960. This has had a direct impact upon the configuration of the MSC government-owned cargo fleet, which is now at an all-time low. The following table points out the importance of the MSC dry cargo lift capability:

MSC TRAFFIC DISTRIBUTION

	Fiscal year 1976	Projected fiscal year 1977
Dry cargo (M/T's)	7,854,542	7,688,835
Government owned ships (percent)	5	2.8
Commercial ships (percent)	95	97.2
Petroleum (L/T's)	10,693,169	10,725,000
Government owned ships (percent)	15	18
Bareboat chartered ships (percent)	42	47
Commercial ships (percent)	43	35

On operational matters the MSC Commander reports directly to the Chief of Naval Operations. However, guidance on financial matters is provided by the Assistant Secretary for Financial Management. Guidance on policy and procurement matters is provided by the Assistant Secretary for Financial Management. Guidance on policy and procurement matters is provided by the Assistant Secretary for Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Logistics. Allocation of sealift resources for support of the shipper services—the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force—is provided, as necessary, by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

MSC maintains a worldwide organization to support its operations. Command headquarters is in Washington, D.C., and four major subordinate units known as area commands, are located as shown—at Yokohama, Japan; Oakland, Calif.; Bayonne, N.J.; and Bremerhaven, Germany. Subarea commands are located in Naples, Italy, and New Orleans. Smaller MSC units known as MSC offices are located wherever Department of Defense traffic requires. The MSC now has 14 and, where warranted, it maintains even smaller MSC units and individual representatives.

The MSC lifts both dry cargo and fuel required by Air Force and Army. The MSC staff must maintain continuing contact with these military departments—as well as with the Navy Department. MSC maintains continuing coordination with the Military Traffic Management Command and Military Airlift Command, the other transportation operating agencies.

MTMC provides terminal services and traffic management data for MSC use in planning and in operations while MAC provides air transportation for rotating MSC ship crews. MSC maintains an interface with the maritime industry and transports petroleum products and dry cargo for all of the military services. Requirements for MSC carriage of petroleum products are levied on MSC by the Defense Fuel Supply Center. The MSC also operates ships for agencies involved in ocean research, space flight, or cable laying and repair. The MSC negotiates contracts with varied maritime labor unions, and with shipyards for repair and modifications to its ships. Since MSC ships about 97 percent of its dry cargo aboard commercial carriers, it maintains close relationships with the commercial shipping companies. My technical amendment seeks to protect the carriage of this cargo.

Obviously, as a major shipping agency, MSC has considerable contact with the Federal Maritime Commission and the Maritime Administration. In all that it does, the MSC is carrying out transportation and procurement policies established by Department of Defense. I might note that the MSC's relationship with the maritime administration includes review of new civilian ship designs—to incorporate defense features—and the use of assets in the National Defense Reserve Fleet.

Specific agreements and legislation have established constraints which impact on MSC operations—and on its acquisition of resources. One is the Wilson-Weeks agreement, negotiated more than 20 years ago by the Secretaries of Commerce and Defense. While recognizing the need for a militarily controlled fleet, capable of meeting initial requirements of a contingency, and requirements commercial ships cannot fulfill, the agreement establishes priorities for acquisition of sealift assets and services on civilian vessels.

Two historic acts which set forth U.S. policy with regard to utilization of commercial U.S.-flag ships have an impact on MSC management of its resources. The 1904 Cargo Preference Act requires that only U.S.-flag ships, including Government-owned vessels, be used for movement of military cargo. We can employ foreign-flag ships only when U.S.-flag ships are not available. And the so-called 50-50 law, requires that at least half of Government cargoes be carried in privately owned ships. The key phrase here is "privately owned," as opposed to the key words in annex A, "operated by a state."

MSC tanker fleet operations are depicted by a similar graph. There is a difference here, however, that should be pointed out. POL deliveries during the Vietnam war years were much higher than during the Korean war, reflecting greater use of vehicles and aircraft. That trend has had an obvious impact on MSC long-range contingency planning.

I will now address MSC's sealift sources. These are the four primary sources of MSC sealift assets and services. The Sealift Command has limited organic resources. Historically, it has relied heavily on the U.S. merchant marine and the National Defense Reserve Fleet. In some instances, as in South Vietnam, it relied on foreign-flag ships to move military cargo.

The effective U.S. control fleet consists of U.S.-owned ships registered under foreign flags which can be recalled in an emergency situation. We must insure that in an emergency situation these various types of vessels are considered to be auxiliary vessels of the United States. The MSC controlled fleet comprises 106 ships, 68 in the nucleus fleet, and 38 privately owned ships under charter by command. The MSC nucleus fleet is comprised of Government-owned ships and bareboat chartered vessels. The latter are all tankers. All ships in the nucleus fleet are known as U.S. naval ships and the initials USNS precede each of their names.

Fifty nucleus fleet vessels are civil service manned while 18 of our 21 nucleus fleet tankers are operated by private contractors for the command. All six of the dry cargo ships in the nucleus fleet are specialized vessels. Three are ice strengthened and are often used in the Arctic and Antarctic. Two are roll-on, roll-off vessels and one is a heavy lift ship. The bulk of the nucleus fleet is made up of special project ships and those involved in direct support of the Navy fleet. The special project ships, all civil service manned, support the Air Force missile test ranges. Navy oceanographic surveys and research activities, cable laying and repair requirements, and similar nontransportation tasks.

Included in the MSC fleet support inventory are eight oilers, a stores ship, four oceangoing tugs, and four fleet ballistic missile resupply ships. All of these are civil service manned. The major element of MSC dry cargo capability for contingency support is represented by the 21 vessels in the chartered fleet. Included are 14 Challenges class breakbulk carriers and six C-4 hulls, two of which are heavy lift ships. The MSC also operates three coal carriers and three small cargo ships which support Air Force missile test range stations. Tankers in the chartered fleet are generally under some type of voyage charter, although one is now on a time charter. Special project ships charters are generally of a specialized nature not available in the U.S.-flag inventory. All chartered ships are manned and operated by their owners—with seamen hired through union hiring halls.

It is obvious from the MSC's heavy reliance on chartered vessels manned by nonmilitary or GSA crews that the status of these vessels must be clarified.

Mr. President, I might add at this point, the present decline of the U.S. merchant fleet, is of substantial concern to the MSC. Several trends in the active merchant marine inventory of dry cargo ships are significant to MSC. The number of these ships has been declining rather rapidly. We now have only about 290 in operation, about half of the 1969 total, and well below the 4,100 we had at the end of World War II. However, the current fleet is highly productive since it contains a high percentage of modern container ships and barge carriers. Tramp ships—primarily breakbulk ships that go where the cargo is—have almost vanished from the U.S.-flag inventory. The 143 remaining breakbulk ships are largely operated by scheduled carriers.

Defense requirements for tankers can best be met by tankers under 50,000 deadweight tons. About 100 of these tankers are owned by independent carriers and many could be available for Defense Department employment.

What about the National Defense Reserve Fleet? The National Defense Reserve Fleet is a responsibility of the Maritime Administration. It now contains only 143 ships having potential military value. Eleven are seatrail class ships—self-sustaining vessels able to deliver wheeled vehicles and helicopters. The remainder of the useful NDRF inventory is made-up of 132 victory ships. Their eventual demise is inevitable—no matter how indestructible they may seem to be.

In total numbers, the effective U.S. control fleet—U.S.-owned foreign flag carriers—appears to be a substantial contingency asset. However, more than 300 are tankers, many of which are too large for military use. Another 85 are bulk cargo ships with limited defense value. The primary potential of the EUSC fleet is that represented by tankers under 50,000 dwt—and the transports.

As we review both peacetime and contingency sealift requirements, current trends in shipbuilding are significant to DOD. New ships are largely non-self-sustaining and highly specialized, and required sophisticated cargo handling support facilities ashore. In an emergency, we may not have those facilities. Although the RO-RO's and barge carriers do not fit fully into this non-self-sustaining category, their numbers are limited. A high percentage of the existing carriers are container ships, vital elements of a global distribution system. Their withdrawal for military use would have a great impact on public sector requirements. Current merchant ship construction is following the same pattern. The bulk ships now under construction or on order are sorely needed since the United States has only 19 such ships to carry the 46 strategic raw materials we must import. Their contingency capability is limited.

In covering the MSC peacetime and contingency sealift missions, I have commented on the shipping resources available to us. No matter how limited, they are what we will have in an emergency. We must learn to reap the maximum advantage from their capabilities. MSC studies have given the United States information which is guiding our efforts to modernize our tanker and cargo fleets—and to effectively configure those fleets to meet both peacetime and contingency needs.

Such studies include MSC review of plans for new civilian ships to insure that as many defense features as possible are incorporated during construction. I refer to features which will help make the ship militarily useful—such as large loading ports and hatch covers, strengthened decks, and use of materials to minimize damage during an attack. An inherent problem is that the features which reduce a ship's commercial productivity are not enthusiastically received by a ship's owners—an understandable reaction. There is also the problem of financially subsidizing the desired military characteristics.

The net result of various planning efforts has been a series of Navy/MSC programs that we refer to under the general heading of sealift enhancement. That program is designed to improve both logistical and strategic sealift capabilities. The overall problem was first presented in the Navy program objectives memorandum for 1977. The Navy directed a detailed analysis of the capability of the MSC controlled fleet, the NDRF and commercial ships committed to MSC for emergency use. A conclusion was reached that a substantial effort should be made to increase the numbers of available civilian ships, and to improve the response time of those assets.

One element is MSC's sealift readiness program. Under this program, commercial carriers who offer to carry MSC cargo commit up to 50 percent of their ships for military use in a nonmobilization type emergency. The ships would be called up in phases, and in accord with a contractual commitment by the carriers. Twenty percent would be available within 20 days; 10 percent more within the next 10 days, and the remainder within 60 days. We must be assured that these vessels will receive priority in the transit of the canal.

In the next fiscal year, MSC revenue is expected to be nearly $1 billion. Based on past experience, more than 80 percent of that will be paid to maritime industry organizations which provide assets, systems, and services to the command. The figures for 1977 are not in yet, but we expect commercial ships to have moved more than 97 percent of MSC's total dry cargo and 82 percent of our petroleum products. Unless my technical amendment is passed, these vessels may not receive priority in time of emergency for transit of the canal.

A recurring theme in sealift is the increasing DOD reliance on the merchant marine. This is understandable, and necessary. In the fiscal year 1977 budget cycle, the Navy initiated a sealift enhancement program. In its present form, this program places strong reliance on the merchant marine. The MSC continues to support funding for tests and exercises to learn how best to employ those privately owned and operated national assets.

Mr. President, I have clearly demonstrated the importance of the military sealift command's reliance on civilian-chartered vessels. It is imperative for the national security of this Nation that we make clear beyond a shadow of a doubt that vessels chartered or leased by the Government of the United States for the carriage of military and nonmilitary Government cargoes constitutes a vessel operated by the United States for purposes of this treaty. If we fail to do so, not only will the bulk of the auxiliary vessels used by the U.S. Navy fail to qualify as auxiliary vessels for head-of-the-line passage, but we will be forever placing ourselves at an inherent, tactical disadvantage relative to the Soviet auxiliary fleet. I would urge each of my colleagues in the Senate to support this technical amendment which clarifies and affirms the intent of the drafters of the treaty.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Tennessee for his indulgence in permitting me to make a statement at this time.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that Thomas Parry and Deirdre Houchins of my staff be accorded the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Anderson). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bill Hoffman and Heidi Boucher of my staff be accorded the privileges of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Foreign Relations Committee has painstakingly scrutinized all aspects of the Panama Canal Treaties during weeks of hearings and in our markup sessions. I believe that the recommendations we have made to the Senate are sound, and I stand ready to work with any of my colleagues and answer any questions they may have. I believe that if the treaties are amended to incorporate the defense guarantees embodied in the Carter-Torrijos statement of clarification, our interests will be well protected.

We are all aware that few issues in recent memory have provoked such an intense outpouring of public sentiment. Yet we in the Senate have an obligation to let rationality prevail.

I trust that at no time will we let this debate degenerate into a bitter and divisive, primarily emotional, battle. Certainly, to date the debate has been conducted in the highest tradition of the Senate.

These treaties were not written overnight. They come, as the distinguished majority leader pointed out earlier today, after 13 years of negotiations conducted with the support of both Republican and Democratic Presidents. The negotiators sought to devise an arrangement to satisfy Panama's justifiable desire to exercise sovereignty over all her territory, and at the same time to preserve the ability of the United States to protect the canal and keep it running efficiently. I think the treaties before us, as we propose to amend them, will achieve these goals.

If we now get bogged down in endless haggling about details, trying to squeeze out a few more years here, or trying to deny Panama some payments there, we will lose sight of our main purpose and we will surely kill the treaties in the process. While this may be the very objective of treaty critics, I would not want to be a party to it. I doubt that any of my colleagues would.

I have questioned treaty opponents about the likely consequences if these treaties are rejected, and have asked outright whether they were ready and willing to deal with the resulting situation. None of them has adequately addressed this problem to my satisfaction.

I believe it will not be as simple as saying, "Go back to the bargaining table." It would be difficult to convince Panama to do this after handing them and two American Presidents—President Carter and President Ford—humiliating defeats. We surely will not be able to get a treaty the next time around that gives us, as the proposed treaty does, almost a quarter century for an orderly transition of control. And we will be perceived by our neighbors in the hemisphere—indeed by countries all over the world—as being unwilling to respond to a nation's desire for sovereignty over all its territory. This is similar to the desire which burned in the hearts of colonial Americans 200 years ago.

This is an important moment in our Nation's history. We have an opportunity, in an atmosphere free from crisis, to demonstrate to the world how a large nation can work with a small nation. A large nation, and a powerful nation, as we are, has to lean over backward in dealing with a small nation, in making absolutely certain that fairness and justice prevail. We can show our willingness to be responsive to the aspirations of a small nation while maintaining our ability to meet our responsibilities as a great world power.

I hope that years from now we can look back on what happened during these proceedings and be proud of what we said and did here.

Mr. President, having studied this issue as intensively as any in my 11 years in the Senate, I have gained an increasing degree of respect for those who take an opposing viewpoint. I have expressed in the Foreign Relations Committee my deep admiration for the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin). He articulated a point of view which represented in the greatest traditions of the Senate the feelings of others of his colleagues who are not on the Foreign Relations Committee. He did so with dignity, with a depth of understanding of the issues, and with an understanding that others could hold opposite views and have his respect as well.

I was really pleased that we had one articulate, intelligent dissenting voice inside the committee and that we did not have a unanimous committee, because we would not have been reflective of the Senate as a whole. We have already heard on the floor articulate, intelligent, and deep feelings expressed by Senators whose patriotism and whose devotion to their country and its national interests cannot possibly be questioned.

The Armed Services Committee has been of great service to the country and to the Senate, even though it does not have jurisdiction in this matter, by having hearings and bringing out points of view, particularly with respect to the economics of the issue, which have helped clarify some of the problems we confront. I intend, as the debate goes on, to address myself particularly to the economic issues, because more factors were brought out that I think should be aired fully and debated fully.

So it is with considerable respect for those in this body and those in the country who have an opposing viewpoint to my own that I begin to engage in this process. But I do so having come to a conclusion, after as much study as I possibly could put into the subject, having arrived at a decision which I think is right, and which I intend to fight for, but also with deep respect for those who hold opposing views. I will listen attentively for any possible factors that I have not taken into account in my own deliberations and in my own study process in arriving at my own conclusions.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois for those very kind and generous remarks.

I say again, as I have said in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in the Senate, that I deeply respect the views of those who have reached a conclusion contrary to mine. It has been a very agonizing decision for me, and I know it has been for others.

We are engaged in one of the most important and historic debates in my service in Congress, touching on any foreign relations issue; and the decision here is going to be one that we will have to live with for a long time.

It seems to me that there are good arguments on both sides, and I commend the Senator from Illinois for recognizing that. I commend all those who have not made a decision, whether they are in the Senate or outside the Senate, to do as the Senator from Illinois has recommended, and that is to listen and to weigh carefully the arguments on both sides.

I thank the Senator from Illinois very much for his contribution.

Mr. PERCY. I thank my colleague. All of us now will have an opportunity at the end of this week to go back to our respective States. I intend to go from one end of my State to the other and raise as a prime issue the Panama Canal and invite all of those who hold opposing viewpoints to address themselves to every aspect of it that they wish and to test my own judgment in any way that they wish.

I hope that I shall conduct myself with the same skill that I saw last night on public television, on one of those rare occasions when I was able to get home by 7:30 p.m. under this new humane policy we have that we will not have votes after 7 p.m.

It was the first time I had been able to get home in a long time at that hour. I saw the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator Sarbanes, who I felt did an absolutely wonderful job. I had deep respect for Senator Garn, also, who held opposing views but who I think presented them well to the television audience on a very distinguished public television program, one of the finest in the country. I think the traditions of the Senate were certainly upheld in that half hour. They presented the kind of dialog that I think should go on in the country because our foreign policy is no better than the understanding of it that is gained by the American people.

Part of the job of a U.S. Senator, just as it is of a Congressman, is to not only listen to all the arguments, study intensively, form our judgment, come to a judgment, make a decision, but then justify that decision. We are put on the pan time and again, and we intend to and will be many, many times in the next 8 days beginning Friday night. The country will have an opportunity to question us in every respect. I think we will come back perhaps somewhat chastened and a little more weary than we are right now possibly, but I think the process will really work, and that process is going to be engaged in right now.

I again extend my deep appreciation to my distinguished colleague from Utah who himself has been an articulate Member of this body on many, many issues. We have not always agreed, but I certainly have the greatest respect for his power of thought and reason and the tenacity with which he really fights for what he believes is in the national interest, and that is what he does on this occasion.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Thomas Jefferson once remarked that he "never saw an instance of one of two disputants convincing the other by argument." Indeed, he added, "I have seen many, on their getting warm, becoming rude, and shooting one another." I expect the debate on the Panama Canal treaties will be warm and even heated at times, because there is a great deal at stake; and I trust that no one will be shot because of it.

What truly concerns me, however, is Mr. Jefferson's inference that passion rather than reason tends to govern human affairs, and that emotional concerns will dominate our discussion. Perhaps they will, in spite of our efforts to think these treaties through carefully. Perhaps some people have already closed their minds to further debate, and cannot be moved from their position by the force of logic or the disclosure of new facts. Certainly many of the proponents and opponents of these treaties have made emotional appeals in support of their arguments. A treaty of this magnitude, that may well determine the course of human history and the fate of the free world, is bound to arouse an emotional response.

I want to congratulate those who are broadcasting this debate. I am informed that this is the first time Senate debate has been broadcast across the air waves.

It is my sincere hope that in the weeks ahead we might prove Mr. Jefferson wrong.

Although I personally listened to all of the administration's arguments and public relations efforts with regard to their support of these treaties, I do want to hear all the points that are brought up on the floor during the debate.

I have always taken the position that we need to upgrade the 1903 treaty. It is not perfect. On the other hand, my present judgment is that these new treaties are not in our national interests. I intend to participate in these debates with an open mind and weigh each and every argument on behalf of the agreements fairly and impartially. But I am going to have to be shown more than just the two amendments regarding our defense and transit rights. They are a good beginning, but they leave many problems unattended.

But I do question how the Senate can deliberate properly and intelligently under the conditions that have been imposed upon us by what I consider to be an impatient and nervous administration. Why is the Senate debating these treaties before the crucial details regarding their implementation have ever been seen? We have before us, as we prepare to offer our advice and consent, a considerable amount of information about the merits of these amendments. I seriously question, however, whether the Senate has sufficient information; and I doubt that Senators have had sufficient time to examine all of it carefully and thoroughly.

When we turn to the specific provisions of the treaties, I think we shall soon discover that there are parts missing or obscure and that we shall be compelled to proceed at a much slower and more cautious rate of speed than many had originally contemplated.

The Foreign Relations Committee has been so rushed that it must now print another report because its original version is peppered with omissions and typographical errors. Only within the last 3 days has the 354-page report of the committee been available to Members. Everywhere the report reflects haste and, in my opinion, carelessness. Aside from the printing errors, we find that many crucial issues have been either passed over lightly or ignored altogether.

Consider, for example, the section of the report dealing with the legal issues. The very complicated question of whether the President has the constitutional authority to dispose of Canal Zone territory by treaty alone, without the approval of both Houses of Congress, as is required by article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution, is dismissed in less than 5 pages—in a brief statement, I might add that I expect to show that this 5-page statement in the Foreign Relations Committee brief really is erroneous when I call up my amendment to the treaties requiring the President to gain congressional approval for these transfers of territory and property.

This is hardly a minor issue, and I must say I am quite astonished that it has been treated in the report in such a cavalier fashion.

At this very moment there is a resolution circulating in the House of Representatives, House Concurrent Resolution 347, the Murphy-Hansen resolution, which has the support of no less than 219 cosponsors. In other words, more than half the membership of the House of Representatives, both Democrats and Republicans, are opposing this flagrant abuse of our fundamental law. They are demanding that they also have the right to vote on this transfer of $10 billion of American territory and property, and I think the Constitution clearly supports their position.

We have taken extensive testimony in the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, testimony from leading constitutional authorities which shows conclusively that the Members of the House have a right and a duty to participate in the disposal of U.S. territory and property.

There are two types of treaties. One is a self-executing treaty, and the other is non-self-executing. The former does not involve the transfer of property, and it does not require the consent of the House of Representatives because no implementing legislation is needed. The President can go and negotiate it through the State Department, through his representatives or ambassadors, with the advice and consent of the Senate, bring it back, and if two-thirds of the Senate ratify it, then it becomes the law of the land.

But the second kind of treaty is the treaty that is involved here, and that is a treaty which involves the transfer of American property. And article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution says you cannot transfer American property without the consent of both Houses of Congress. The Canal Zone and all of the property there cannot be transferred by treaty alone. Implementing legislation is also required, because Congress has exclusive control over territory and property.

And the reason the Founding Fathers gave this power to Congress, is because they did not want any President acquiring, governing, or transferring territory or property without having all 535 Representatives of the people in this Federal republic having a voice in the matter.

I think it is pretty significant that just today at least 219 of the Members of the House of Representatives, our Congressmen, have signed a resolution demanding that they have the obligation and opportunity for and on behalf of their constituents and this country of voting up and down on these transfers.

I submit that they should have a right to do so and that we in this legislative body ought to prevent this overreach by the President in violation of the Separation of Powers Doctrine.

There has also been an extensive discussion, particularly in the House of Representatives, over the issue of whether the various payments to Panama as provided for in this agreement shall be based on legislative appropriations. The treaty is silent on this subject and so is the report of the Foreign Relations Committee. The Constitution provides that no funds shall be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriations and yet it is clear that the treaty provides for payments to Panama. Again, we have a President, the Executive, bypassing the Congress, bypassing the House of Representatives in derogation of the Separation of Powers and article I of the Constitution to extend his power. If this great body allows that to occur I think we will have abandoned one of the pillars of our Constitution.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. If I could just continue for a minute.

Mr. SARBANES. It is just on the point.

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Bentsen). The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I think one thing is clear: The Senator may argue—I think it is an argument without legal validity—that the House of Representatives must be involved in the disposal of property, but I think the law is very clear on that point. I do not think it has been dealt with in a cavalier fashion by the committee. The number of pages which you give to a subject are not an indication of how well you deal with it; it is the quality of the consideration that matters.

Mr. HATCH. Let us include the matter of quality, because I do not think the quality of the statement is very high, either.

Mr. SARBANES. Obviously the Senator and I disagree on that point.

Mr. HATCH. It would seem that we do.

Mr. SARBANES. We are proceeding here with an exercise of the treaty-making power. The Senator's point really runs to the role of the Senate and the role of the House, and it does not establish overreaching on the part of the Executive.

Mr. HATCH. I respectfully disagree.

Mr. SARBANES. The Executive has never contested our role; clearly, for the treaties are now before us for advice and consent, which will require a two-thirds vote on the part of this body, an extraordinary majority on the part of the Senate to approve these treaties. So there has been no effort on the part of the Executive to bypass or to ignore the Congress.

The distinguished Senator may want to change the role of the Senate and the House of Representatives within the institution of Congress, but I do not think it is accurate, indeed it is not accurate at all, or fair, to say that the Executive is seeking to bypass the legislative branch of our Government in this matter.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the comments of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, but I sat through hours of hearings on this subject before the Separation of Powers Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am the ranking minority member, and the President's witnesses indicated repeatedly that he has concurrent jurisdiction with the Senate to dispose of territories in spite of the fact that article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution says that Congress—not the Senate, the Congress—shall have the power to dispose of and make all regulations respecting territory or other property belonging to the United States.

I might add that some of the leading legal scholars in this land support my position very strongly, and I cite in particular Dr. Raoul Berger, formerly associated with Harvard Law School, who, when he was criticizing President Nixon and providing legal ammunition by which President Nixon could be impeached, was praised throughout the country, but now when he is coming out in favor of House participation in the disposal of territory under these treaties, he is ignored by the media, despite the fact that he himself, if he were a Senator, would vote for the treaties except for these constitutional defects. But he has made it clear that no reasonable Senator should vote for these treaties unless the property transfers are approved by the House of Representatives as well as the Senate; and I think the precedents backs him up in every way.

The second point I would like to make is that these treaties are requiring the American people to make millions of dollars of payments in the absence of legislative appropriations.

The wording of the treaties suggests that the appropriations process will be sidestepped, and that the many different payments to Panama will be made by the new Panama Canal Commission out of tolls. As the sponsor of an amendment to the treaties requiring that all these payments be appropriated, I am rather mystified by the committee's total disregard of this important legal issue.

Likewise, the printed hearings of the Senate Armed Services Committee reached me only a few days ago, and Senators are still awaiting the committee report. This is hardly surprising in view of the fact the committee completed hearings only a week ago. These hearings were very brief, and did not even touch upon the constitutional issues concerning the role of Congress in the disposal of U.S. territory and the role of the House in the appropriations process. At the same time, they contain 525 pages of testimony. Thus within the short span of approximately 1 week, Senators are expected to have read and digested nearly 1,000 pages of hearings and reports. This does not include the Report of the Armed Services Committee, which was just arrived, or the 2,423 pages of hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee that were printed only about 3 weeks ago. This is not to mention the volumes of hearings that have already been printed by other committees in the House and Senate, and I cite with particularity the Separation of Power Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

My purpose in bringing these matters to the attention of the Senate is not to fault the committees—for they have been faced with heavy demands in a short space of time—but to illustrate the fact we are not only presently overburdened with more information than we can possibly read and assimilate, but also are handicapped by the lack of specific information that is necessary for deliberation.

Mr. President, this is not a legislative atmosphere conducive to thoughtful debate. Speed is no virtue in a legislative assembly. If the Senate is to work its will properly, then we must be assured that each and every provision of these treaties will receive full and ample consideration. I trust, therefore, that Senators will resist political pressures to dispense with these treaties in a hasty manner, and that the proponents of ratification will, in particular, accommodate the need for thoroughness and precision.

TWENTY FLAWS

The need for extended debate will become more obvious, I believe, once it is clear that these treaties have been thrown together in a haphazard fashion and in their present form spell political, economic, and military disaster for the United States of America. My preliminary estimate is that there are at least 20 major flaws contained in the treaties, either explicitly or implicitly, all of which warrant our close attention. At the appropriate time, I shall address my remarks to these problems in more detail. And doubtless other Senators will uncover ambiguities, discrepancies, errors, uncertainties, puzzling questions, and omissions that I have overlooked, or that I have presently chosen to omit, as we delve more deeply into the documents.

For the moment, however, I shall discuss them only briefly, in order to point out the scope of the problems and the direction I shall take in attempting to deal with them. Two problems that I have already touched upon concern the role of Congress in the disposal of U.S. territory and the role of the House in the appropriations process. These are certainly among the most serious problems we face in connection with these treaties, because they affect our Constitution. Let me turn to the other problems that I have encountered.

Third. A recent line-by-line analysis indicates that there are a number of substantive inconsistencies between the English and Spanish versions of the treaties. These inconsistencies create a second layer of problems for the United States, because they will require the United States to contend not only with conflicting interpretations of the English text, which, incidentally, are bad enough, but also the Spanish translation or translations.

I might mention that I am going to offer an amendment to the treaties which will provide that if we have disagreements upon the differences between the Spanish and English translations, then, in that event, the English text shall prevail.

Fourth. There is some doubt as to whether the joint statement issued by President Carter and General Torrijos allegedly clarifying the ambiguity over our right to intervene militarily to defend the canal actually accomplishes this purpose. According to the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service, for example, the legal effect of the joint statement is uncertain. The CRS analysis concludes that—

The Carter-Torrijos statement, while guaranteeing each party the right to act against threats directed at the Canal, also specifies that the U.S. may not intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

I think that is a pretty important consideration.

Fifth. International legal scholars point out that the treaties contain no mechanism for compulsory third party adjudication of differences concerning nondefense issues.

Sixth. International legal scholars also point out that the treaties contain two ambiguities on transit rights. Pursuant to annexes A and B of the Neutrality Treaty, the treaty area is defined to include Panamanian territorial sea areas around the entrance to the canal delimited pursuant to the 3-mile limit. It is possible, therefore, that Panama would feel free to apply the more restrictive "innocent passage" provisions as they claim to apply them beyond the 3-mile area out to 200 miles.

Article VI(I) provides a right of transit for U.S. warships and auxiliary vessels "Irrespective of their internal operation, means of propulsion, origin, destination—or cargo carried." By negative implication, it might be argued that these features could be the basis for discrimination against certain categories of commercial vessels.

Seventh. There may be a potential ambiguity under articles 20 and 22 of the revised charter of the Organization of American States (OAS), which is binding on the United States, in connection with U.S. defense rights under the treaty. Article 20 provides that—

The territory of a State is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly, on any grounds whatever.

Article 22 then goes on to provide that "measures adopted for the maintenance of peace and security in accordance with existing treaties do not constitute a violation" of this principle. The defense rights of the United States are presently exercisable under the 1903 Treaty—an "existing treaty" under article 22. Do these defense rights continue under article 22, in light of the fact these treaties terminate the "existing treaty" of 1903?

Eighth. Former Deputy Secretary of Defense William P. Clements has recently revealed that the former administration had obtained consent for a security clause that clearly protected American defense rights in the Canal Zone. The clause, which was approved by the National Security Council, the Department of State, the Pentagon, and even General Torrijos, unambiguously gave the United States the unilateral authority to defend the canal, even without the approval of Panama. Why was this clause replaced by the ambiguous terminology of the present agreement?

It makes one wonder because it had been completely agreed to before. We have testimony to that effect and yet we have people here who, at one time, argued that we did not even need these two amendments that the joint leadership recommended to us.

Ninth. The treaties purport to extend many guarantees to the United States. It is questionable whether such guarantees are meaningful, however, if they are simply paper guarantees—all sail and no anchor. The treaty provides, for example, that American warships shall enjoy expeditious transit, and the joint statement indicates that they shall even go "to the head of the line." But how does the United States enforce this guarantee if the Panamanians control all of the facilities of the canal and its ports, if Panamanians are in charge, and refuse or fail to cooperate? How can the United States be assured of expeditious transit if the United States does not own or even operate the canal?

Nothing in the treaties solves these difficulties.

Likewise, the treaty provides that only the Republic of Panama may maintain military forces in Panama after the year 2000. But how does the United States exercise its right to defend the canal and its duty to maintain the regime of neutrality if all of the military installations are owned and occupied by Panama? What would be the costs in terms of manpower, material, and money? Would U.S. troops occupy Panamanian soil to keep the canal operational? Would they have the ability to operate the canal or would the United States be required to keep a permanent corps of canal pilots and other trained specialists who could be sent to Panama to keep the canal operating in times of emergency?

Tenth. Except for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are politically answerable to the administration, most American military leaders warn that loss of the canal would jeopardize our national security. An exhaustive analysis by the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress concerning the importance of the canal in terms of our strategic mobility and logistic support indicates that the canal will be even more vital to our defense needs in the year 2000 than it is now. In examining the role of the canal in facilitating the shipment of munitions to an Asian military operation, the study shows, for example, that we have only one munitions port on the west coast, and that this port is capable of loading only 4,000 tons per day. Since, based on past experience, the requirement could easily be 10,000 tons daily, at least 6,000 tons would have to come from the east coast, where most munitions are manufactured, and from which most transit the canal.

Adm. James Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations, and Adm. Thomas Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff from 1970 to 1974 point out that the present Canal Zone serves as a base of naval and air operations 3,000 miles south of the United States. Moreover, the Canal Zone is the only refueling center south of California in the Pacific. When the United States no longer has use of the bases and ports and facilities of the Canal Zone after the year 2000, will not the loss of these strategic sources adversely affect our ability to control and defend a vast area of land and sea?

Sometimes it overwhelms you when you stop to consider that the principal reason advocated for these treaties is for national security purposes. They seem to ignore a lot of these facts that are brought out, not necessarily by opponents to the treaties, but by people who understand the security needs of this country.

Eleventh. The treaty assumes that the giveaway of the canal will usher in an era of good feelings in Latin America and that our Latin American neighbors support Panama's bid for the canal. The President has made this claim, as have representatives of the State Department.

But there is an abundance of evidence which suggests that many Latin American countries are deeply concerned about the treaties. This is not surprising, when we stop to consider that South America has no reliable east-west land transportation and must rely heavily on the canal. What do they stand to gain economically when the tolls increase, as they are sure to do under these treaties? When visiting heads of state from Latin America were invited to Washington by the President to witness the signing of the treaties and were asked to sign the so-called Declaration of Washington, what explains the fact that they refused to endorse the treaties and agreed simply to congratulate Carter and Torrijos "for having initiated the steps that would lead to full sovereignty of the Republic of Panama over the totality of its territory"? What explains the refusal of some Latin American political leaders to participate in these signing ceremonies?

Recently, Lt. Gen. Gordon Sumner, Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board, which is an independent international organization established by the Rio Treaty, testified before the Armed Services Committee that there is widespread anxiety in Latin America about the economic consequences of these treaties. General Sumner based this observation on his personal discussions with heads of state and high level defense officers in 17 Latin American countries.

Twelfth. The treaty not only forbids the United States from entering into an agreement with a third country for the construction of a new hemispheric interoceanic canal, but in effect closes the door to completion of the modernization project of the present canal. Panama lacks the capital and other resources to complete the Terminal Lake-Third Locks project that was begun after the Second World War, and it is not likely that the United States would pour additional millions into a canal that it no longer owned. Consequently, it is highly unlikely that there will be any improvements in the canal during the remainder of this century under these treaties.

I suspect that the Panamanians will place a higher priority on banking debts they owe and other debts throughout the world—which, incidentally, have skyrocketed under President Torrijos' regime.

Thirteenth. Another underlying assumption of the treaties is that the canal is a potential military hazard to the United States and cannot be defended against guerrilla attacks and sabotage. But if the canal is already indefensible, then it would be even more so if the U.S. military presence is reduced from 17 to 4 bases, as this treaty provides. The question also arises as to whether a tiny country of less than 2 million people has the capability or desire of carrying on a sustained military operation against a well-defended canal from which it benefits economically.

Fourteenth. Many substantive matters concerning the relationship between Panama and the United States, including defense, are contained not in the treaties themselves but in supplementary executive agreements. These executive agreements can be modified in the future by the President, without the assent of the Senate. The Senate is thus asked to approve not only the treaties themselves, but to grant wide discretionary authority to the President far into the future. This is delegation of legislative authority run rampant, which can serve only to expand the powers of the Chief Executive at the expense of the legislative branch—something which I hope none of us really wants to do.

Fifteenth. Under article IV of the agreement in implementation of article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States agrees to "emplace no type of nuclear armament of Panamanian territory," because Panama is a signatory to the Latin American Denuclearization Treaty. Such an important restriction serves no purpose other than to weaken our Southern defense and improve the nuclear strategy of our enemies.

On the other hand, I think it is a fair question to ask: Why did not our negotiators obtain language which keeps powers unfriendly to the United States out of Panama, including powers which possess nuclear weapons?

These treaties do not do anything about that. As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the treaties that prohibits an unfriendly power from using our ports, bases, and facilities. Nothing prevents Panama from opening those to the Soviets, to the Cubans, or to anybody else who would be eager to weaken or destroy us.

Sixteenth. Contrary to the assertions of State Department representatives, it seems certain that the canal cannot be operated under these treaties on a self-supporting basis, and that the American people will be called upon to pay millions, perhaps billions, of their hard earned dollars to the Panamanians. The Comptroller General of the United States, Elmer Staats, estimates, for example, that deficits during the first year could range from $37 to $79 million. Other estimates, such as that made under the auspices of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, indicate that the deficit could reach nearly $100 million.

It makes you wonder. Who is going to pay those deficits? Do you think Panama is going to be able to pay those deficits? Not unless they make a deal with somebody else that is most likely to be in contravention of the obligations that they would owe to us.

This wonderful friendship that is going to arise once we transfer the canal to them, that is miraculously to appear overnight. Even though we all know that Mr. Torrijos has gone all over the Third World, running this country down, and that his closest friends are Fidel Castro and Qadaffi, of Libya, is a pipedream.

I do not know about the folks in this Chamber, today. But I will tell you that the American people are not going to buy it and I am not going to buy it.

Seventeenth. The implementing legislation establishing the structure of the new Panama Canal Commission, its accounting practices, and the range of labor benefits has still not been presented to Congress by the administration, although it was promised for last October. What is more, basic financial issues have not yet been negotiated with Panama. Governor Parfitt of the Panama Canal Zone has testified that the United States and Panama are in disagreement regarding a number of these issues. Thus, the Senate is being asked to give its advice and consent on a treaty about which it does not have complete information.

Eighteenth. The treaties contain a number of hidden costs which have not been brought to the attention of the American people by the administration. In recent testimony before the Armed Services Committee, Comptroller General Elmer Staats revealed the following information: First, the Republic of Panama has refused to pay for services rendered by the Panama Canal Company in the amount of $8.4 million. Some of this debt goes back as far as 1955. Second, early retirement costs to be charged to the Civil Service Commission under these treaties will cost $7.5 million a year, or a total of $165 million over the next 22 years. Third, costs of benefits for dependents of certain personnel transferred to DOD (mainly schooling) will cost $5 million a year for the next 22 years, or a total of $110 million. Fourth, inventory costs could reach as high as $2 million. The last complete inventory of all assets of the Panama Canal Company, and Canal Zone Government took place in 1950-51, at a cost of $750,000, and that was in 1950-51 dollars. Fifth, the annual payment of $10 million to Panama for such services as police and fire protection, street maintenance, and garbage collection is actually an indirect subsidy, in part, of $6.6 million a year for at least 3 years, totaling $19.8 million. Because of Panama's lower wage scale, and other factors, it is estimated that Panama will need only $4.4 million per year to provide these services. The treaty provides that these payments will be adjusted after 3 years on the basis of actual costs, but the treaty does not define actual costs and it is not clear, therefore, how the costs will be calculated.

Nineteenth. There is no indication, from the language of the treaty, whether the commission should pay interest to the U.S. treaty on the U.S. investment, although the administration has indicated that the forthcoming implementing legislative package will relieve the commission of its statutory obligation to pay interest. Does this mean that the projected amount of interest of approximately $20 million a year will be a donation by the American people to the commission? Should the United States attempt to recoup its investment through accelerated depreciation charges? The treaty does not indicate how these problems are to be resolved—again thoroughly lacking in this area.

Twentieth. The treaty is no less ambiguous as to how the annual surplus or contingent payment of up to $10 million is to be treated with regard to financial and toll setting plans. Will the tolls be set at such a rate as to eliminate the surplus each year, and if so would this not cause friction between the United States and Panama? And if no contingent fees are paid for 22 years, does the United States owe Panama $220 million in the year 2000? The terms of the treaties do not give us any clues as to how these issues shall be resolved.

Mr. President, these are 20 problems that I have encountered with these treaties. There are many more, to be sure, and I intend to get into them in the course of this debate. This list is not definitive but illustrative of the many flaws contained in these documents. In a larger sense, of course, some of these defects are overshadowed by more serious issues that concern not just the canal but the integrity of our system of government and perhaps our very existence as a free, democratic Nation.

For many months, I have been increasingly disturbed by the manner in which these treaties were negotiated, and the way in which representatives of the State Department, especially the negotiators, were attempting to gain public support for the agreements. Negotiations, until they were actually concluded, were shrouded in secrecy, as though the administration had something to hide from the American people. No Member of the Senate, as is often the custom, was ever included in these negotiations.

I might mention that a representative of big labor went down there, insisted upon, as I understand it, by big labor's leaders. Yet not one Senator was invited, not one Congressman. We all know why the representative of big labor went down there. I think the millions of union members throughout the country know, almost all of whom are in disagreement with the leadership of the unions in this regard.

I might also mention that the President took no interest in any fireside chats to explain to the American people why these negotiations were being held or what they meant to us in terms of our national interests and security. A cold silence fell upon the White House and, except for a few courageous Members of Congress, no one sought to alert the American people to what was going on down in Panama. Neither the past administration nor the present came to Congress and so much as asked for authority to enter into the crucial negotiations which ultimately produced these incredible treaties. This, incidentally, would have been the way to do it under our Constitution.

And when the new administration came to power, the same pattern of aloofness and secrecy was adopted. Like his predecessor, President Carter labored behind the scenes at his self-appointed task. Instead of appointing a new Ambassador to conduct these secret negotiations in the normal manner, he appointed Mr. Sol Linowitz to a temporary post, thereby avoiding the Senate confirmation process and denying to the Senate an opportunity to find out what the President, on his own authority, without consulting the representatives of the people in Congress, was planning for us.

Certainly, every other ambassador has to come in and justify his credentials to prove he has no conflict of interest. Not only ambassadors, but many other people in government.

We have seen in the Bert Lance case how very important it is for the Senate to do its confirmation job, to ask these people the right questions. We did not have that privilege with regard to Mr. Linowitz.

I do not know about the rest of my colleagues in the Senate, but I know there are a lot of people in this country that are very concerned about this and really believe that something is wrong.

The negotiations were so rigged that Linowitz' temporary appointment expired only hours before negotiations were completed and the treaty provisions basically agreed to.

And now, after all is done and we have been pushed by the President into a very difficult situation, he suddenly appears on television to tell us that President Theodore Roosevelt, of all people, would favor these treaties, and that much of the opposition to the treaties is based on misunderstanding and misinformation. If this be so, then who is to blame for not informing us a long time ago, when we sought information and were denied it?

But I would submit that is not true, anyway. I think the people of this country are not as foolish as many of our leaders think they are. I think they know what is going on and I think they realize that there are major issues here and this is not just a simple little treaty.

The truth of the matter, Mr. President—and this is what concerns me more than anything else I have discussed today—is that the American people are once again being subjected to what appear to be deliberate misrepresentations of the real facts by our Chief Executive. I hope I am wrong, but I do not know what else to conclude after listening to the President's address to the Nation last week. In that address, to give you an example, the President said—and I am quoting directly from his speech—"the canal should continue to be self-supporting." Are we paying Panamanians to take the canal?" asks the President. "We are not," he says. "Under the new treaties payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal."

The question arises: On what basis can the President of the United States of America make such a flat, unequivocal statement when, on the very same day that he made those statements earlier, Elmer Staats, our Comptroller General, is here in the Senate explaining that there are not only millions of dollars of hidden costs in these treaties that will almost certainly be borne by the American taxpayer, but that the whole scheme is not at all likely to be self-supporting. As Staats makes abundantly clear in his closing remarks, and these are his words:

If canal transits fall short of what is currently estimated, it is possible that toll revenues will be insufficient to cover the costs of the commission, including the scheduled payments to Panama. In this eventuality, the U.S. Government is likely to be required to provide financial assistance either through congressional appropriations or by allowing the commission to borrow from the Treasury.

That was the day of the evening when the President told us that we are never going to have to pay a dime as a result of these treaties.

And then a day later, Governor Parfitt of the Canal Zone came before the very same committee as Staats and told the members: "I believe you should be alert to the possibility that the canal operation may not be self-sustaining in the outyears," indicating that Panama will surely have economic problems in the year 1984, just 6 years from today.

Mr. President, we cannot inspire public confidence in our Government through negotiations secretly arrived at, or by twisting the facts. All of the facts that the supporters of these treaties have in their arsenal will be put to the test here on this floor.

So far as secrecy is concerned, I shall only say that it has no place here. Above all, it is no secret that the American people are overwhelming against these treaties and I am persuaded that even more will join in opposition when we are finished with this debate. And if, after our deliberations are concluded, it is clear that the supporters have not turned public opinion around in their favor, then it is clear that these treaties are doomed. For if they do not enjoy public support, they will not prevail. As former Secretary of State Rogers told the Senate in 1971:

If there is one lesson we have learned from this involvement in Vietnam, it is that we need congressional support and we need public support.

Thus far, the administration has denied that it needs congressional support for these treaties, and it has every intention of bypassing the House of Representatives. Until very recently, it has ignored the public and disregarded the fact that the American people are not inclined to surrender their canal for no apparent reason. I think that Senators will ignore these considerations at their own peril.

I might say finally that when I was down in Panama in August of last year that one of the leading members of our Government of the Canal Zone indicated to me that Mr. Linowitz had not at that point, as the treaties were being negotiated, even come into the canal zone.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, I am delighted to yield to one of the great Senators in the U.S. Senate, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Helms).

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished Senator. Let me say that he is rendering great service in this body, and citizens all over America are increasingly grateful to him.

Mr. President, I commend Senator Hatch on his remarks, particularly his pinning down and specifying the misrepresentations which have been so abundant in the discussion of this issue over the past several months.

Now, I am not one to say that the President of the United States intentionally misled the American people in a report.

Mr. HATCH. Nor am I.

Mr. HELMS. But one thing is certain. Either he misled the people intentionally, or he did so unintentionally. The fact remains that his address was laden with misrepresentations.

For example, he said that not one Panamanian signed the 1903 treaty when, as a matter of fact, as the Senator from North Carolina pointed out on the floor this morning, nine Panamanians—I repeat: nine Panamanians—signed the 1903 treaty.

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. HELMS. The President also said that we—the United States—do not own the Canal Zone, that we have never owned it, when, as a matter of fact, the deeds are on record wherein the U.S. Government purchased from private landowners property. The United States paid Panama, and paid Colombia. The United States even paid the French Canal Co. for its land in fee simple, its equipment, and its concessions.

Then, there is the question, I say to the distinguished Senator from Utah, of whether our friends in Latin America will love us if we do not give away the Panama Canal.

This Senator has been to South American countries representing three-fourths of the populations, the gross national product and the geography of South America. I have met with the heads of state in each of these countries and without exception they told me, in effect, "Don't give Torrijos that canal,"—because, I say to the Senator from Utah, they know what will happen. They know what will happen to the tolls.

The thing that bothers me as the Senator from North Carolina is: Why do we not level with the people of this country?

Thank the Lord that the American people have seen through all of the obfuscation because, as the Senator has just said, despite all the propaganda, despite the fact that the major news media of this country have virtually ignored testimony by distinguished Americans in opposition to this treaty, the American people still are opposed to the giveaway of the Panama Canal.

The Senator from Utah alluded to testimony before the Armed Services Committee last week and the week before. Except for one brief story in the Washington Star, this Senator has not seen one mention of testimony by Admiral Moorer, General Sumner, and others, who warned that the defense capability of this country will be imperiled if we surrender control of the Panama Canal.

So I commend the Senator from Utah for his careful examination of the evidence in this matter, and I wish him Godspeed in continuing. I thank the Senator for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. HATCH. I thank my dear friend and colleague from North Carolina.

There is one other question I would like to raise in addition to the 20 I have raised, and there are a number of questions raised within the 20.

What happens if the canal becomes too costly for the Government of Panama to operate? If that happens, who then has the right to operate it? Who would receive the tolls from it? Under these circumstances, do we have a right then to go in and operate it, after the year 2000? What if Panama decides to shut down the Canal for any reason? I have been told by some of the proponents of this treaty that that will never happen because Panama's economy depends too much on this canal. They say Panama would never do that to us because it is so dependent upon the United States of America, because 70 percent of all the traffic and tonnage that goes through the canal goes to or from the United States. This is what they say.

Some of these people are the same people who said that Fidel Castro would never turn his back on us. He was "the great agrarian reformer" who was going to liberate the people of Cuba.

I recall a banquet in Washington in which he was praised to the skies as the liberator of the Cuban people, and he went to New York and said he had been a Communist all his life. They said he would not turn his back on us because, frankly, he was dependent upon American commerce, our tourist industry, the tobacco industry, the sugar industry, and that that would never happen. But it did. It happened because a billion and a half bucks every year are poured down that sewer by the Soviet Union.

Why would it not be advantageous for the Soviet Union to do the same here and embarrass and put pressure on the United States. Then they will say, "My goodness, you always raise the scare." But is that so?

Last summer, in the Panamanian newspapers, it was very clearly delineated—we have copies of them—that a Soviet "trade delegation" headed by Nikolai Zinoviev went to Panama to do basically four or five things. Number one, to negotiate to build a heavy-duty equipment plant; two, to build a hydroelectric powerplant; three, to establish a Russian bank; four, to establish a Russian propaganda network; five, to acquire the rights to the Old France World War I airbase outside the city of Colon; and six, to purchase 50,000 metric tons of raw sugar at double the world price during a sugar glut.

Now, I wonder why they would be doing that? What makes me wonder even more is why the President does not wonder why they are doing that.

I could be wrong in my questions on this and the worries I have about it, but I think there is a lot more involved here.

I reiterate: I do not think the American people are stupid, as some of my friends in Congress think they are.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I shall be pleased to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LUGAR. I appreciate the Senator's mention earlier of the rights of the House of Representatives in this matter and the economic analysis which he mentioned in his arguments today.

I should like to pose this question for the sake of this debate, because I think the Senator has put his finger upon a very vulnerable part of both the treaty and the canal.

In connection with the cash situation faltering, Mr. Staats, in his testimony, indicated that there may be some very real difficulties; that the implementing legislation is not before us; that all the business arrangements remain virtually unknown at this point. The problem is clearly, as the Senator has pointed out, that we cannot calculate the flow of traffic, but we presume there may be some difficulties.

There is testimony with regard to the post-1980 period, with respect to the lack of oil traffic, for example, the fact that the tolls may be increased 30 percent to 40 percent right off the bat which could lead to some lessening of demand, although there is a projection that you have to get to a 75 percent increase before it tapers off drastically. There are the expectations on the part of the Panamanians of moneys that may flow and may help social services and upgrade the Government of Panama.

If revenues do not equate with expenses and there are not reserves to cover these, at some point this leads to a question of who will pay. How would the Senator face this question—that appropriations on the part of the U.S. Government might be called for in some year during the next 5 or 10 or 15 years?

Earlier in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Utah, he mentioned that appropriation bills commence in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HATCH. Mandated by the Constitution.

Mr. LUGAR. This is an intriguing question with the regard to participation by the House of Representatives of this juncture. Very clearly, it has been expedient for the administration to attempt to gain rulings that the House was not involved, to try, I suppose, to finesse that entire issue, even while 219 of our colleagues in Congress, Members of the House, want very much to be involved. Very clearly, in my judgment—and I inquire whether the Senator shares this feeling—they may well be involved when appropriations are required to bail out the faltering economy of this situation on a business arrangement which is entirely inconceivable for the moment.

What does the distinguished Senator feel will be the reaction of the House of Representatives with regard to initiating appropriation bills to finance the Panama Canal in subsequent years, if their interest has been totally disregarded in the arguments?

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Indiana (Mr. Lugar) for raising these interesting questions, because they really go to the heart of this problem.

We have not gone to the House of Representatives for authorization to begin the negotiations for these treaties. We are going to bypass them, regarding property transfers and payments according to some Senators—I hope not—in spite of the fact that 218 Members of the House have signed a resolution asking for their right to consider these transfers and their right to have 435 Representatives stand one way or the other and be counted.

I suspect that another fact is important at this juncture, and that is that it is not just later that they are going to be called upon to vote on appropriations. The minute this treaty goes into effect, they are going to be called upon to do this.

Who is going to pay the commission costs pursuant to a new treaty? Who is going to pay the labor costs, the transfer costs, the early retirement costs, and so forth? We had members of the State Department testify that some of these costs are subject to the appropriations process. They indicated that they will have to come in with their tail between their legs, to the House of Representatives, and beg them for appropriations.

I am sure that the great argument then will be that the United States will be embarrassed if we do not automatically grant these appropriations.

I will tell the Senator what I would do if I were a Member of the House. I would consider whether or not it might not be for the betterment of this country that it refuse to appropriate.

The Senator raises the question of the economic burden on the United States if Panama is unable to maintain and operate the canal pursuant to these treaties. At least for the next 22 years, especially during that period of time after 1984, according to Governor Parfitt's testimony, we will have to subsidize them or they will have to find money to maintain the canal.

They may be unable to pay for the maintenance of that canal, which is monumental. It is an engineering problem every year, and it is a costly problem. With inflation rising in Panama, they will have increasing difficulties in meeting the responsibilities, and these treaties may not take care of them.

Certainly not economically. I do not think anybody who knows anything about economics would argue that they do. If they cannot maintain the canal, there is nothing in these treaties that provides for a right of the United States to come in and manage it or take it over or do anything else.

But let me mention the importance of the Panama Canal to U.S. agriculture, just to cite one important economic consideration.

The Panama Canal continues to be the critical east-west link for U.S. agricultural trade. One-fifth of all American agricultural exports are shipped through the Panama Canal.

In 1976, one-fifth of all corn exports, one-fourth of all soybean exports, and nearly half of all grain sorghum exports went through the canal. These three products combined earned $9.1 billion in foreign exchange for the United States during 1976 out of the $23 billion in total U.S. farm exports. Adding in other bulk products dependent on canal transit—including wheat (especially hard red winter wheat from the Great Plains) and cotton—the figure would climb even higher.

In 1976, the Panama Canal handled 70 percent of all U.S. farm commodity exports to 15 markets in the Far East. The Asian market is now worth $8.5 billion annually to U.S. farmers.

Even with toll rises, the Panama Canal remains the most economic means of shipping bulk products. Rerouting grain shipments around South America would double transportation costs and shipping time. Cross country land-sea transportation would be prohibitively expensive for grains and soybeans. Existing transportation and port facilities could not handle the volume increases required to circumvent the canal.

Without access to the canal, U.S. farmers would be unable to compete with Australia and other exporting nations with access to the Pacific for Asian markets.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a comment at this point?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LUGAR. The Senator from Utah is certainly perceptive about the concerns of a great many citizens of Indiana because the agricultural shipments that are going to Indiana and other Midwestern States very frequently use the Panama Canal to reach our valued customers in Japan and elsewhere.

A very great concern of many of us is that the Panama Canal, as many have pointed out, is an aging utility. It is a utility that may require extensive maintenance and repairs. We are not talking about hypothetical expenses. We are talking about expenses that normally come with the facilities that many of our colleagues, including the distinguished Senator from Utah, have witnessed in operation.

Later in this debate I want to address attention of all of us to the fact that we should have been negotiating an economic treaty. We have been enraptured with the problem of sovereignty and we have been arguing that, and that is an important point, but the facts of life are that with whoever controls the canal we are going to come to a point of money. Precisely how is it to be financed, and how the cash flow is to be maintained, and which set of taxpayers will do this, and for whose benefit?

These are questions that are appropriately raised, I think, right along with any conditions of national security which are, of course, involved in this.

And I greatly appreciate the distinguished Senator from Utah's analysis this afternoon.

Mr. HATCH. I thank my colleague from Indiana.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to my friend and colleague from Missouri (Mr. Danforth).

Mr. DANFORTH. The Senator, I think has very fairly stated the serious consequences that would flow from shutting down the Panama Canal. I wish to ask the Senator what course of events he could foresee occurring which would result in shutting down the Panama Canal or making it inaccessible for American shipping?

Mr. HATCH. Of course, that is calling for a prophecy, and I do not pretend to be a prophet, but I will say this: I believe that if we turn over the canal to the Panamanian Government pursuant to these particular treaties, which are so ambiguously written, so lacking in, I think, good legal form, with all of the problems that I have cited, we are in trouble.

Mr. DANFORTH. I understand. But what I am asking is what course of events would occur which would, as the Senator says, shut down the Panama Canal?

Mr. HATCH. I am getting to that.

I would submit that within 3 to 10 years, and I could be wrong on this—and I hope that I am—that the Panamanian leaders might find some reason, adequate or otherwise, for shutting down the canal to embarrass the United States of America.

It is not the first time we have been embarrassed by, should I say, antiethical powers.

I might add that there is a built-in economic inability on the part of Panama to operate that canal.

Mr. DANFORTH. I wonder if I could ask Senator Griffin a question about one of Senator Hatch's conclusions. I know Senator Griffin, as I understand it, is the floor manager on our side, or the Republican side on this matter, and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and he is an exceptionally able lawyer and student of this matter.

But Senator Hatch indicated that the Republic of Panama is unfriendly to the United States.

Mr. HATCH. No. Excuse me. I have to interrupt the Senator. I did not say the Republic of Panama. I said the leadership, Omar Torrijos and approximately 20 other leaders in Panama are unfriendly. The people in Panama are very friendly to this country.

Mr. DANFORTH. I wish to ask Senator Griffin. We talk about friendly countries and unfriendly countries. Is Panama a friendly country to the United States?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I say to the Senator from Missouri that that is a question I suppose each Senator will answer for himself. Of course, it is friendly as compared with some countries and unfriendly as compared with others.

My own experience, having been there, is that there is an underlying friendship for the United States that you find among the people of Panama.

Despite the hostility that they have with respect to the canal, it has been my general impression that the people of Panama like the United States, and that there is at least the potential for the improvement of our relations.

My own position is that it is important that we conduct ourselves in considering these treaties and act with respect to them in such a way that we can improve rather than destroy our relations with the people of Panama and with the people of the rest of the hemisphere.

Mr. DANFORTH. The Senator would say, I would guess, that Cuba is not a friend of the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly the leadership of Cuba does not give any indication of being a friend to the United States.

Mr. DANFORTH. The Senator would not put Panama in that category?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to hope that a lot of people who live in Cuba continue to be friends.

Mr. DANFORTH. Would the Senator put the United States in the same category as Cuba or not?

Mr. HATCH. Panama.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator means Panama.

Mr. DANFORTH. Panama.

Would the Senator put Panama in the same category as Cuba or not?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I would not. But, on the other hand, it all depends what aspect of the Panamanian situation you are trying to evaluate. If you are trying to evaluate the leadership, trying to evaluate the human rights record, as I pointed out in my statement the other day, the Torrijos government of Panama last year was rated as having the worst human rights record of any government in this hemisphere except Cuba.

Mr. DANFORTH. Having a bad human rights record does not necessarily mean they are not a friend of the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I agree. But I would also say to the Senator from Missouri that I think whatever the relationships are between our Government and the particular temporarily serving ruler of the Republic of Panama is a pretty unstable situation to focus on or to depend on. Because I would have a great deal of concern that the Government of Panama could turn over at any time.

Mr. DANFORTH. Senator Hatch was predicting the possibility of an attempt made to embarrass the United States—

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think the Senator from Missouri should direct his questions in that respect to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. DANFORTH. But I mean to follow—you are on the Foreign Relations Committee, and I was just curious to know whether you thought the relationship we had with Panama was of an unfriendly nature, which would lead the present Government of Panama to, as Senator Hatch says, shut down the Panama Canal in order to embarrass the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think one can only speculate about that.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is what I would like you to do.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I expressed the concern that I had, and that I continue to have, that under the treaties that we have before us, the situation between now and the year 2000, and the inadequate protection that we accord the U.S. citizens who are highly skilled and absolutely essential to the operation of the canal, we could have a situation where the very ratification of these treaties by the Senate could trigger an exodus of skilled U.S. personnel that could close down the canal. You know, that is a real possibility.

Mr. DANFORTH. But would it be an unfriendly act by Panama?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That would not be in and of itself, except as the concern of the U.S. citizens in the Canal Zone is reflected. Obviously, if you talk to them, they have concern about what is going to happen to them if we ratify these treaties. Now, they may or may not be justified in their concern, but they do have it. Suddenly, instead of operating in a 10-mile-wide area that is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, they are going to try to operate and maintain a canal in a foreign country, under the laws of Panama, the courts of Panama, and the police of Panama. They have concern, and I think with some reason.

Mr. HATCH. If I might take the floor a minute, do you know how many changes of regime Panama has had since 1913?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know. It has been quite a few.

Mr. HATCH. It has been in excess of 50.

Mr. THURMOND. Fifty-nine.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would take the Senator's word.

Mr. THURMOND. Fifty-nine, in 73 years.

Mr. HATCH. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri and my other colleagues on the floor that that does not lead one to believe the Government of Panama is stable. I would also submit that I agree with Senator Griffin, there is speculation as to whether they would shut it down to embarrass us.

I think it is not a speculative question if you look at the economics. That is a pretty important question, and I do not think we can ignore it. If you look at the economics of the situation, I do not think it is speculation to say that they would have to come back to the United States of America for funds if they want to continue the operation of the canal.

Mr. DANFORTH. I would say I am deeply concerned about the economics in connection with the question of the maintenance and continued operation of the canal, but I did want to ask these questions, and I appreciate your indulgence so I can ask them. It is that I think the image that people have of the proverbial tinhorn dictator who is the dupe of some foreign power and, for the sake of humiliating the United States, would just shut down the Panama Canal—I wanted to ask you and Senator Griffin in particular, who have watched this matter so carefully, whether you think we are dealing with a really unfriendly government in the Republic of Panama now.

Mr. HATCH. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. DANFORTH. I am just asking; I am not purporting to—

Mr. HATCH. I know; I want to return the compliment. Do you feel there is no possibility whatsoever that the Torrijos government would want to embarrass the United States of America?

Mr. DANFORTH. I am asking you the question.

Mr. HATCH. Well, it is not my time—I have the floor, so let me ask you, in return.

Mr. DANFORTH. I am one of the uncommitted group.

Mr. HATCH. Let me say I think it is a possibility, and one we cannot ignore in dealings with Panama, among other nations.

Mr. DANFORTH. Let me ask you if you are concerned—

Mr. HATCH. But I am concerned with the economics, lest the American taxpayers be bled to death.

Mr. DANFORTH. I think the economic question is one with which I am less concerned. I would really like to address the political one.

The president of United Brands, which operates the United Fruit Co., claims to be the biggest user of the Panama Canal, and he said, in the Foreign Relations Committee:

As a company, Panama has been good to us, and we believe it has been a good neighbor of our country as well.

You know, I am not talking about competence in upkeep, and I am not talking about economic considerations. I think that the economic considerations, as I say, are a matter that deserves very careful attention and debate during the course of these deliberations, but what I wanted to get at is the very simple question of whether Panama itself, as a country, historically, through 59 different governments, whether it has or has not been a good neighbor to the United States, whether it has or has not been a friendly country, and whether it is or is not a good neighbor and a friendly country today.

Mr. HATCH. Well, let me say this in answer to my friend's question: Yes, we have had a great friendship with Panama, which I would like to see continued. This friendship has not always been fostered in the atmosphere of the present leadership in Panama. Under the previous leader, Demetrio Lakas, we enjoyed great friendship, but I think very few people would argue, and I would be surprised to hear any Senator argue, that Omar Torrijos has been a great friend of the United States. I think all the evidence has been to the contrary.

I have never called him a tinhorn dictator, but he may be exactly that. I am saying he has never been a great friend of our country, and that these treaties, that are fraught with legal and economic difficulties, are not going to suddenly turn him on to be a great friend of the United States. I think history has shown otherwise. I think we cannot ignore history.

All I can say is this, that I think anybody who believes that these treaties are suddenly going to make great friends out of the leaders such as Torrijos is not correct.

Mr. DANFORTH. I am asking if today and historically Panama has been a friend of the United States. I am not asking if they love us but if they have been a friend.

Mr. HATCH. I really do think so. When we were there, we met a number of labor leaders. Two in particular stood up and said these treaties would not be good for Panama or the United States. It was an act of courage because Torrijos' friends were sitting there. That was said under a regime which has been rated the lowest in this hemisphere on human rights except for Cuba. The fact is they said it. Others were very much in favor of these particular treaties and some were diametrically opposed to the United States in a radical way. All of the American labor leaders at that point down there were basically against these treaties. That was back in August, and I do not know what has happened since, though I would be surprised if they changed their viewpoint.

Mr. DANFORTH. Can I pursue one more point? I apologize for taking up so much of the Senator's time. The Senator talked about maybe within the next 10 years Panama, in order to embarrass the United States, would shut down the canal.

Mr. HATCH. Or for any other reason, but that has to be considered as a potential problem.

Mr. DANFORTH. Am I mistaken that we are going to be operating the Panama Canal for the next 23 years, and that we are going to have troops on the scene?

Mr. HATCH. Basically, in some way, yes, because we are going to have a five-to-four control of the commission. That does not necessarily mean that we control it. Also, they might shut down our military bases from 17 to 4. We will be turning over all civil and military jurisdiction, even over our military forces, as I understand it, to the Panamanian Government. We will be paying them to do the garbage collection and military policing in the Canal Zone. We will not be doing that any longer.

Mr. DANFORTH. I am not talking about garbage collection. I am talking about operation of the Panama Canal.

Mr. HATCH. I think there will be considerable changes under these treaties.

Mr. DANFORTH. I am talking about whether or not, as a practical matter, it is possible between now and the year 2000 for Panama to shut down the Panama Canal.

Mr. HATCH. I think it is very possible, but let us——

Mr. DANFORTH. Does the Senator feel that would happen?

Mr. HATCH. No; because basically we are going to shut down the military bases from 17 to 4 and we are turning over jurisdiction to the canal. There are radicals in Panama who hate the United States of America, who may or may not be able to be controlled. The monetary difficulties are going to bring great and tremendous pressures on Panama. I think anybody who reads these treaties, and there was testimony on it, will see that that is a very serious problem. I think we have unfriendly leaders in Panama who certainly have not shown a propensity to be loyal supporters of the United States.

Mr. DANFORTH. Does the Senator think, and I am not arguing but I am trying to understand the argument, or does the Senator believe that there is a possibility that between now and the year 2000 Panama will shut down the Panama Canal?

Mr. HATCH. I think there is a possibility. I would not say it is a probability but it is a possibility. I think it is a probability that they will without further American financing, without further American appropriations. I think it is a probability.

Mr. DANFORTH. Without more financing than we would provide without the treaties?

Mr. HATCH. Than we would pay pursuant to these treaties.

Mr. DANFORTH. Without more financing than we would provide without the treaties?

Mr. HATCH. I do not know what financing we would provide without these treaties, in addition to what we are paying right now. It has grown from $169 million in 10 years to $2.9 billion today. So we are apparently not providing enough to them, even though we have provided to Panama, on a per capita basis, more foreign assistance than any other country in the world.

Let me just say what Governor Parfitt said. Of course, he is a general in the Corps of Engineers. He said:

Within the first year after the treaties went into effect, at least 43 percent of the American Canal Company employees have indicated that they would leave jobs in the canal, and that is a low estimate. Some have estimated as many as 69 percent. There wouldn't be enough really to run the operation in the first year, much less train Panamanians to do the jobs.

That was before the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. DANFORTH. Did he provide the figures on how many would be leaving if the treaties were not ratified?

Mr. HATCH. No; he did indicate before the Separation of Powers Subcommittee a personal opinion, that he felt that the problem was if we did not ratify the treaties, that the administration, regardless of who was in the administration, would act with dispatch to resolve any difficulties that might arise. He did indicate that. He was not afraid that the administration would act with dispatch, that he would stop any uprising which would occur, any more than he would be afraid of operating the Guantanamo Naval Base in Cuba.

Mr. DANFORTH. I have pursued the same line of questions with various people. I was told that there is some possibility of an exit of American personnel if the treaties are ratified. I was also told that there was some possibility of an exit of American personnel if the treaties are not ratified.

My basic view of the whole issue, as a matter of fact, is that the whole thing could very well turn sour whether we ratify the treaties or do not.

Mr. HATCH. That has been my argument for a long time, but because of the actions of our State Department and ambassadors over the course of time they have put us in such a serious dilemma by not negotiating proper treaties that we will be in trouble no matter what we do.

Mr. DANFORTH. I do not know whether or not any individuals or groups, but I think just the course of world events.

Mr. HATCH. This appears to be it. I share that sentiment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Can the Senator give me an assurance that if the treaties are not ratified, things will operate smoothly in Panama and that the Panama Canal will continue to go on without a hitch?

Mr. HATCH. The only thing I can say there is that I believe the interests of the United States would be better served and that we will probably over the long period of time have less difficulties in the United States if we refuse to ratify these treaties but make it clear that we will renegotiate the treaties so that they will be satisfactory to both nations. That would be in the best interests of both nations, and these treaties are not, in my opinion.

Mr. DANFORTH. Would the Senator agree with me that no matter what we do there is a fairly good chance that things are going to, in one way or another, go sour with the Panama Canal?

Mr. HATCH. I think there is a good chance no matter what we do that we are going to have difficulties. I think we are going to have much more difficulty, and I think history will bear it out, though I could certainly be wrong, I think we will have much more difficulty if we ratify these treaties in their present form without consideration of all the things I brought up today.

If we could resolve the difficulties that I have brought up today, I would not have any problem at all with voting for these treaties myself, but I do not think we are going to resolve those difficulties. It is a question of whether the Senators, 67 of them, are going to vote for the treaties or not. If they do, we will have to live with it. If they do not, we are not going to have the treaties and will have to live with whatever is there. But I hope at that point we will have an aggressive administration, and President Carter certainly has indicated that he would be aggressive. I would suspect if we do so judiciously and quickly we will not have a great many difficulties, but only God can tell the answer to that.

I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. I thank my colleague for yielding.

I think the chief point I wanted to make, and which has perhaps been made by our colleague from Missouri, is that it seems to me that on the economic side a larger part of the concern would exist whether or not we entered into these treaties. There is no question about it, we will need new locomotives. We need a lot of work on the canal in addition to regular maintenance. That would have to be met whether we turned the canal over or not. And I do not think there would be any greater cost to the United States if we waited.

Mr. HATCH. As you are the ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I want to show that respect and deference on the floor, but I do not see how—

Mr. CASE. If I understand correctly, the Senator and I are very fond of each other and regard each other highly as individuals. We would not lift a finger not only not to harm each other but we would defend each other to the death against the panoplies that people from the outside might attempt to visit upon us.

The question is, what is the wise thing to do here?

Mr. HATCH. I do say this: I do not think that a serious argument can be made that these treaties will not cost the United States a lot more money than we are presently paying right now because, if the tolls go up, the United States is going to pay the bulk of those tolls. If we transfer all of this property, we are going to have to see that it maintains itself through appropriations here.

The argument is going to come in afterward that we are going to need those appropriations in order not to be embarrassed. I am suggesting, why not face the problem now? Let the House vote on it. Maybe they will vote for these treaties. That would end a lot of the controversy.

Mr. CASE. Well, I am sorry that I cannot agree with the Senator that the House should have an initial voice in this decision.

Mr. HATCH. I understand that is the Senator's position.

Mr. CASE. I think this is a matter in which the Constitution requires action by the Senate—a two-thirds majority, not a majority as for legislation—and the Senate alone. If the House decides in its wisdom that it will not enact legislation to implement the treaty, that would be for the House to decide later. This has always been so in regard to treaties, commencing with the treaty that ended the Revolutionary War, where the House was not even, as the Senator will recall, permitted by General Washington to see the documents relating to the negotiations with France.

Mr. HATCH. That, of course, involved a totally different problem.

Mr. CASE. I know.

Mr. HATCH. What I am saying is that all prior legal precedents support my position, in my opinion and in the opinion of some fairly effective people.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that?

Mr. HATCH. No, I will not.

Mr. CASE. I would yield, except I do not have the floor.

I would like to make this point. The Senator's argument in regard to the economic difficulties under the treaty really comes down to the question of whether it is going to be as competently maintained under, first of all, the Joint Commission, and then, eventually, of course, under the Panamanian Government alone.

Mr. HATCH. I do not think the word "competently"—

Mr. CASE. The expenses that are involved here are going to have to be paid in some fashion, whether out of tolls or out of governmental appropriations of money supplied by the taxpayers.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator admit, then, that we may have to have extra governmental appropriations in order to maintain the Panama Canal, after we have given it to Panama?

Mr. CASE. I do not know whether we will or not. I do know that, except for the argument that it is not going to be efficiently maintained, the Senator's whole economic position fails, because we are going to be in that position—

Mr. HATCH. No, because we would still have $10 billion worth of property. We would still be operating it. Last year, we lost $7 million, not the billions that we stand to lose under this particular treaty. We can raise the tolls again to cover the $7 million loss.

Mr. CASE. There is no argument between the Senator and me about several points. There is no argument that we have been taking what we call interest in varying amounts. We have not always been collecting the total amount.

Mr. HATCH. That is correct, but we have done fairly well.

Mr. CASE. That we are going to get, that is true. There is no argument with the Senator, or between us, on the question of costs of our withdrawal in respect of retirement pay. There is no question about these arguments.

I do object, and I am sure the Senator would not disagree with me on this, to accumulating depreciation and saying that we are paying $440 million over the next 20 years, or some such figure as that, on property that everybody admits we are giving away right now.

Now, you can say we should not give away the Panama Canal to Panama. That is one single point; that is, to do that. Except for these costs of operating the transfer, there is no argument between the Senator and me. We are either giving away something that has depreciated in value some $600 million, or something that has a present market value of $5 billion to $6 billion.

Mr. HATCH. Actually $10 billion, according to the staff.

Mr. CASE. We are giving it away.

Mr. HATCH. That is a significant difference.

Mr. CASE. I do not think it is at all. The only value the canal has for the United States or for the rest of the world, including Panama—except as she may be able to operate it at a profit which she can use for other purposes, which the Senator and I would agree is a very doubtful thing—the only use it has for anybody is to go through it. If the best way to go through it is to turn it over to Panama, as some of us think, if the best chance of keeping that right and keeping it an active right is to do that, then that is the wise thing to do, whether or not we go through the motions of saying, this is yours, now, it is not mine. It does not take a nickel to do that, except for the incidental costs the Senator and I would agree do exist. I do not argue with that.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator and I have our disagreement, as the Senator knows, on this matter.

I did not mean to sound as if I would not recognize Senator Sarbanes before, but we had our colloquy going. I would like to recognize him at this time.

Mr. CASE. The Senator is in charge of the time.

Mr. SARBANES. I was prompted to interject by the statement of the Senator from Utah that all prior legal precedent indicates that there is a role for the House of Representatives with respect to property disposition in this matter. That is simply not the case.

Mr. HATCH. But there is.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator from Utah may want to make an argument to that effect, but I think it is a legally deficient argument.

Mr. HATCH. Can the Senator cite one precedent that does not back up that argument? Would he cite a few precedents?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes, they are cited in the committee report.

Mr. HATCH. Why not tell me what those stand for?

Mr. SARBANES. There is a list in the committee report.

Mr. HATCH. Let us get it out and see what they stand for. Maybe we can do that later when I bring up my amendment.

But I can say right now that every one of the precedents that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is considering is very extinguishable.

Mr. DANFORTH. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HATCH. If Senator Sarbanes is through.

Mr. SARBANES. There are precedents set out on pages 65 through 69 of this committee report.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator wants to cite one of them as a particularly weighty precedent, I should like to see it—anyone he wants to cite.

Mr. SARBANES. I cite them all to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. I ask him to cite one and tell us why it is a weighty precedent, because I do not think he can.

Mr. SARBANES. I think each of them is of weight and I cite them all to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Cite the fact and the issue and the holding involved in the case and tell me why it is a weighty precedent; that is all I am asking. I am saying there is not a weighty precedent on the Senator's side of the argument and there is all kinds of weight, including three transfers of property in Panama, all transfers in the past, which are made subject to approval by the House of Representatives. I think that is pretty weighty. I think my American people think it is a pretty weighty thing.

Mr. DANFORTH. May I just inquire on this point?

Mr. HATCH. Surely, I am happy to recognize the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. It seems to me the Senator from Utah is a lawyer and Senator Sarbanes is a lawyer; I am a lawyer; most people in the Senate are lawyers.

Mr. CASE. The Senate is many other things as well.

Mr. DANFORTH. Lawyers always argue about the meaning of cases and they never resolve it among themselves. I should not think the U.S. Senate would be a particularly good place to resolve an issue of law. That is what courts are for.

If treaties are constitutionally infirm, then they are not worth the paper they are written on. The only way, it seems to me, to determine whether they are constitutionally infirm would be to litigate that question in a court and then take it all the way to the Supreme Court of the United States.

So why not settle it that way? Why do we have to debate it here?

Mr. HATCH. Let me answer that question. I would suggest that if we have to wait for the court to handle this, they cannot do it in the next month that this will be decided. If we ratify this treaty and the court comes down and with an opinion that says yes, Senator Hatch and all the others who agreed with him are right, then nothing will be accomplished. We will not be able to do anything about it then, regardless of what the Supreme Court says.

I think it is an issue that has to be faced by the Senate, because we are going to make a determination without a vote in the House and thus be in error under article IV, section 3, clause 2, which is very important.

There have been things which I consider to be erroneous and, I think, very indefensible arguments by the State Department—for example, that the President has concurrent jurisdiction. But they cannot, in my opinion, bring forth a weighty case, and I do not think the five pages of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee report makes a weighty case against the position that article IV, section 3, clause 2 mandates, especially under the prior history and weight of information with regard to the three transfers of property in Panama, that the House of Representatives should vote on it.

I have taken enough time today and I would be happy to yield.

Mr. DANFORTH. May I ask one question?

Mr. HATCH. Surely.

Mr. DANFORTH. At what point in time does the first treaty, the Panama Canal Treaty, become effective?

Mr. HATCH. Six months after ratification is when it becomes effective.

Mr. DANFORTH. Six months after?

Mr. HATCH. As far as I understand.

Mr. DANFORTH. Is that correct, 6 months after ratification?

Mr. HATCH. That is correct.

Mr. DANFORTH. Well, I would imagine that the courts would deal with the matter in a very expeditious fashion.

Mr. HATCH. Does the Senator think, as an attorney, the case in the district court that has to go to a circuit court and then the Supreme Court, where cases languish as long as 6 years, will be determined in 6 months?

Mr. DANFORTH. I think with the importance of this case the courts would dispose of the issue very expeditiously.

Mr. HATCH. I understand the distinguished Senator from Missouri's point and as former attorney general of Missouri I have to give him a lot of credit to do that, but one of our major oaths as Senators is upholding the Constitution. We have, as a legislative body, a coequal right to define that Constitution under certain circumstances. This is one of them.

I understand the Senator's position and respect it, as I respect him, and he knows that. But the fact of the matter is that we are not going to solve this problem by letting a court solve it after the fact. I think we have to face the issue here as Senators and determine whether or not we are going to allow our colleagues in the House the opportunity to vote on this.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HATCH. My point is that we should.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Could another lawyer get in here?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DANFORTH. Let me make this one point and, believe me, I will sit down.

I think one Justice said that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is, and we are not, I do not think, in a very good position to adjudicate a constitutional issue on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. But we are in a position to determine whether or not our colleagues in the House have a right to vote on it.

Mr. DANFORTH. This is what courts are for, and if we have done something which is a constitutional infirmity, then it would become a nullity. So I do not understand why we have to bring that issue up.

My view is, frankly, that there are important issues to be raised with respect to the Panama Canal Treaty and with respect to the Neutrality Treaty; that they do involve maintenance; they involve repair and they involve economic questions; and that those issues should be debated at length.

But what concerns me is that we can sort of muddy the waters by bringing up unrelated issues, which I think we can go on and on and argue first, when there is another forum that can properly adjudicate it.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator and I respectfully disagree on that. As far as muddying waters, I think we are muddying by not deciding something as momentous as to whether or not the President is violating the separation of powers doctrine and extending his power to the exclusion of the other two coequal branches of Government. I think it is our responsibility when we know the courts cannot decide it, whether we ratify or do not ratify this. I think we would be remiss not to, especially in light of the fact that 219 Congressmen asked us to; I think it would be a breach of our responsibility.

I would go so far as to say it is an affront to the House of Representatives if we do not consider them in this.

Now, I am going to bring up the amendment. It may very well be that the Senate will vote and say that the House does not have the opportunity and will not have the opportunity. If that is the case, I think we are wrong, but I will have abided by it, as we all know.

But I am going to argue as forcefully as I can that there is a lot more involved than just a minor constitutional issue. This is a major, monumental constitutional issue that the Senate does have a right to determine under these circumstances.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I just want to register another point of view. I want to say that I do not agree with the Senator from Utah that it is all that clear and absolute that the House has a constitutional right to be involved in the conveyance of property.

On the other hand, I think they have a good case to make and they have been making it throughout the history of Congress from the time of the Jay Treaties.

On the other hand, I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that this is not an important issue in the sense that the Senate should look at it.

I would say this: Whether the House concurrence is required with respect to the conveyance of real estate and property, or not, there is no getting around the fact that these treaties are not self-executing.

They are not like other treaties that do not require implementation.

If we ratify these treaties without the approval or concurrence of the House, the very first thing that must be done under article III of the principal treaty is that the United States of America shall, in accordance with the terms of this treaty and the provisions of United States law, carry out its responsibility by means of a U.S. Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America.

Whether or not appropriations are going to be called for, and I tend to agree the day is not far distant when we will be asking the House of Representatives to appropriate additional funds, there is no question that the House of Representatives immediately is going to have to pass a bill to constitute a new entity known as the Panama Canal Commission which will be composed of five U.S. members and four Panamanian members.

Whether or not the House concurrence is required with respect to the conveyance of property, would it not be the better part of wisdom for the administration, to say nothing of the Senate, to seek the approval of the House of Representatives on these treaties?

Now, while it is not required by the Constitution, there is not anything to prevent the administration from submitting these treaties after they have been acted on by the Senate, if they are ratified, to the House for their approval.

Or another possibility would be to proceed, as the Senator from Utah has suggested, with an amendment to the ratification resolution which would withhold the deposit of the ratification document until the House of Representatives has approved them, and especially when 219 Members are on record now demanding participation and when there is no question they are going to have to participate. I frankly think that whether it is required by law or what the Supreme Court would say or would not say, it would be just, wise, and prudent policy to follow that course of action.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to thank my friend from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) for the comments he has made.

But although we may disagree to a degree, I think his statement was a good statement and one with which I heartily agree, for the most part.

I want to say that I thank the public broadcasting system, or whoever is broadcasting this, because I do think that for the first time the American people have an opportunity of at least listening to some of these issues that are very important and very momentous.

I say that I, for one, will be very loathe to deny my colleagues in the House, when better than half of them have asked for a right to participate, when it is clear they are going to have to participate if the treaties are ratified, the right to participate now.

I think it is a mistake. I think it is a breach of our obligation as Senators.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. Church addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I would like to speak briefly to the question that has occupied the Senate during the last few minutes.

Mr. Thurmond addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I had understood that I was to follow the distinguished Senator from Utah; is that correct?

Mr. CHURCH. I might have asked the Senator to yield. It will only take me a minute or two, to insert some material in the Record.

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hodges). The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) is recognized.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, there is no question that the Senate could amend the treaty in such a way as to permit the House of Representatives to pass upon the question of divestiture of any property. If we did that, I think we would make a great mistake, for this would diminish the constitutional prerogative of the Senate to handle treaties.

I hope the Senate will reject any amendments of that kind, because the Constitution confers on this body the exclusive right to ratify treaties. We can do so only by mobilizing a two-thirds vote, while the House can decide by a simple majority.

But when the argument is made that the House possesses a constitutional right to participate, I think that is simply without foundation. Only recently, certain Senators who oppose these treaties brought an action in the Federal courts and sought an injunction on the very question of whether the House possessed a constitutional right to pass on the conveyance of property belonging to the United States. The Supreme Court refused to hear the case. The injunction was refused. Under our system, it is left to the courts to determine such questions. So I believe that this is an argument without foundation.

Moreover, when the committee held its hearings on the treaties, the Attorney General of the United States appeared, to address this very point. I will read into the Record his final conclusion, and then I will yield the floor. It reads as follows:

The final point which I wish to make is that throughout our history Presidents acting with the advice and consent of the Senate have made numerous self-executing treaties transferring territory or property belonging to or claimed by the United States. One example, cited in the Opinion, is the 1819 Florida Treaty with Spain. Under that treaty the United States ceded all its territory beyond the Sabine River in Texas to Spain in return for the cession of the Spanish territories of East and West Florida. While there had been some dispute over some of the relevant boundaries, the congressional debates, as well as President Monroe's annual message to Congress, make it clear that many considered the action to be an outright cession of American territory in exchange for Spanish territory. 36 Annals of Congress 1719-38, 1743-81; 2 J. Richards, Messages and Papers of the Presidents 55 (1896). There was no statute authorizing this cession of American territory. There have been numerous other treaties which have transferred U.S. territory or compromised U.S. claims. See, e.g., United States-Great Britain Treaty of 1842 (Webster-Ashburton), 8 Stat. 572, T.S. No. 119; United States-Great Britain Treaty in regard to limits westward of the Rocky Mountains of 1846 (Oregon Treaty), 9 Stat. 869, T.S. No. 120.

In conclusion, the text and history of the Constitution, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court and historical treaty practice all support the opinion I recently rendered that property of the United States may be transferred by treaty absent statutory authorization.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I listened carefully and noted that in that communication from the Attorney General, he referred to a self-executing treaty. I wonder whether the Senator from Idaho disagrees with the Senator from Michigan concerning whether or not these treaties, particularly the Panama Canal Treaty, are self-executing. I contend that it is not self-executing, in the sense that implementing legislation clearly is going to be required and the treaties cannot stand on their own.

Mr. CHURCH. My reply to the Senator is that, in certain respects, these treaties are self-executing. In other respects, implementing legislation will be required. However, with reference to the transfer of property, which is the question at issue, I think the treaties are self-executing.

Actually, I really believe that the Senator from Michigan and I are not on opposite sides of this proposition. He makes the case that, as a matter of policy, we should amend this treaty in such a way as to permit the House of Representatives to act on the question of property transfers.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Particularly because the treaties are not self-executing in other respects, irrespective of what the situation may be concerning property.

Mr. CHURCH. I believe, on the other hand, that to amend the treaties in this fashion would create a very bad precedent, because the Senate would be denigrating its own authority under the Constitution.

In any case, there is no legal basis for the argument that the Constitution itself confers some right upon the House of Representatives to act in this case, and the effort to establish that proposition has already been rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator stated that this contention has been rejected by the Supreme Court. Not on the merits, I say to the distinguished Senator. It was not the matter of the separation of powers. The Supreme Court felt that it should not inject itself into a legislative matter. Is that not correct?

Mr. CHURCH. The Supreme Court refused to hear the case.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, but not on its merits, I insist.

Mr. CHURCH. The purpose of the plaintiffs was to secure an injunction, and the effect of the Supreme Court's refusal to hear the case was to deny them the injunction.

Mr. ALLEN. Again I say that they did not decide the case on the merits and on the constitutional issue involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Thurmond) is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this week the Senate begins the formal debate on the Panama Canal treaties, a debate which in fact has been underway in the meeting halls, towns and cities of America since last September when President Carter and General Torrijos signed the treaty documents in ceremonies here in the Nation's Capital.

TREATIES FATAALLY FLAWED

My visit to Panama in August 1977 and my study of the treaties since that time have convinced me these documents are fatally flawed and should not be consented to by this body.

This does not mean the United States should slam the door in Panama's face relative to a new treaty. Rather, a full debate and careful study of all the issues will reveal that these particular treaties are not in the best interests of the United States or the Republic of Panama. Therefore, I trust this formal debate will convince the Senate that on these treaties the Senators should advise the President to seek new agreements rather than consent to those already reached.

Mr. President, of great importance to this debate is the new information on the treaties which was developed in the recently completed hearings of the Senate Armed Services Committee. These findings impact on the financial, defense and economic aspects of the proposed treaties.

Key points highlighted by the testimony before our Committee on Armed Services included the following:

First. The Senate must receive and consider the implementing legislation if it is to act on these treaties in an informed and responsible manner. To do otherwise would defeat the purpose of this or any treaty, that purpose being to resolve or prevent disagreements, not create them.

Second. The American public must be told during this debate of the huge costs which may be incurred by the U.S. Government and the taxpayer under these treaties. The administration has not been forthright in their claim that the treaties "require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayers."

Third. The ability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission to make huge annual payments to Panama while at the same time remain self-sustaining must be carefully examined by the Senate during these debates.

Fourth. Issues for possible conflict between Panama and the United States under the treaties must be clarified and agreed to by both sides if we are to avoid setting the stage for serious disagreements in the future. Proponents of the treaties argue these documents will buy for the United States good relations in future years. However, a careful examination of the treaties, particularly the financial provisions, raises the likelihood that new disputes will be created rather than prevented.

1. IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

Mr. President, yesterday I delivered to the majority and minority leaders of the Senate letters urging that they use their position to prevail upon the administration and the State Department to submit the implementing legislation.

The Senate must know the direct costs of implementing these treaties and evaluate carefully the risks that appropriated funds will be required to meet our obligations over the next 22 years.

The treaty implementing legislation is the key determinant of the financial viability of the proposed Panama Canal Commission. Only this legislation can answer such critical questions as: What Government agency will run the Commission? How will the annual contingent payment to Panama be handled in financial and toll setting plans? How will personnel termination costs or base relocation costs be financed? What should be done to relate payments to Panama for public services to the actual costs incurred? How can the quality of these services be assured? What will be the range of labor benefits for Panamanian employees? What will be the accounting practices used and who will audit this new Commission? How will Panama's $8.4 million debt to the present Canal Company for past services be settled? How will the Commission finance capital improvements?

These are but a few of the questions for which there will be no answers until the implementing legislation is presented. In my judgment, the Senate will be making a serious mistake if we attempt to act on the treaties without the implementing legislation.

2. U.S. FACES HUGE COSTS

Mr. President, the Secretary of State testified before the Foreign Relations Committee as follows:

The Treaties require no new appropriations, nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayer.

Quite the contrary is true. Besides turning over to Panama a $8 to $9 billion investment, the Armed Services Committee hearings revealed costs of the treaties could run as high as $2.3 billion, some of which would come from appropriated funds.

Earlier this week, Secretary Vance in a letter to Senator John Culver, admitted the yet to be submitted implementing legislation would excuse the canal from interest payments to the U.S. Treasury. This alone would cost the Government a minimum of $440 million in income by the year 2000.

The treaties also trigger other direct costs to the Government, unless they are charged to the Canal Commission. These would include $43 million to relocate U.S. military bases, $165 million in early retirement costs for U.S. employees and $110 million in schooling costs. Testimony indicates all of these costs would come from appropriated funds.

Further, the United States has made these commitments to Panama: up to $200 million in Export-Import Bank credits, up to $75 million in Agency for International Development housing guarantees, $200 million in Overseas Private Investment Corporation loan guarantees, and $50 million in foreign military sale credits.

In addition to the costs already cited, an approximate $1.5 billion over the next 22 years is expected to be paid directly to Panama under the treaties, all of which is to be financed by higher tolls. These costs include: $880 million collected by Panama from tonnage commission, $220 million in direct annuities, $220 million minimum payment for services rendered by Panama, and up to $220 million in payments from excess revenues of the Canal Commission.

Since about 70 percent of the canal traffic either originates or terminates in the United States, the American taxpayer will have to shoulder the burden of these higher costs.

3. CAN THE CANAL SURVIVE FINANCIALLY?

Mr. President, the great burdens placed on the finances of the Canal Commission by these treaties brings into question the very survival of this vital waterway.

In these treaties the administration has constructed a financial plan designed to pour millions of dollars into Panama's debt-ridden government. Hearings in the Armed Services Committee indicated the administration in its efforts to meet Panama's money requirements, may have constructed through these treaties a financial scheme doomed to failure.

Maj. Gen. Harold Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone, warned the canal operation may not be self-sustaining after 1984 under the terms of the proposed treaties. Until 1984 large quantities of Alaska oil will be moving through the canal, but after that date this business will be lost to a new pipeline and the land bridge in the United States. Governor Parfitt testified there was a high probability that the United States would have to make up the difference between canal income and the required payments to Panama between 1984 and 2000.

The payments to Panama under the treaties of about $1.5 billion are to be financed through higher tolls on ships using the canal. However, tolls can be increased only to a point without the loss of business to the so-called land bridge. Tolls have already been raised about 40 percent in the last several years, and under the treaties an immediate increase of 25 to 40 percent is predicted.

Economic experts are in dispute as to how high the tolls can be raised without such actions being counterproductive. All experts agree, however, that once traffic managers decide to move their goods across land, the business is not easily or quickly regained.

Secretary Vance in a recent letter to the Senate, indicates that the implementing legislation will provide that the borrowing authority of the Panama Canal Company will be transferred to the Panama Canal Commission. Thus, it is obvious the administration itself recognizes the heavy financial risks involved in these treaties. Further, my colleagues should bear in mind the United States is obligated under the treaties to turn the canal over to Panama in 1999 debt free—I repeat, debt free. That means if the Canal Commission cannot sustain itself through higher tolls, the United States will have to pay off the deficits in 1999.

Thus, by placing these burdens on the Canal Commission are we unwittingly sowing the seeds which could bring about the failure of the canal as an economic means for movement of goods to and from the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans?

4. UNITED STATES/PANAMA CONFLICTS LIKELY

Mr. President, one of the most important revelations of the Armed Services Committee hearings was that the ambiguities ranging throughout the treaties raised the unwelcome prospects of new disputes—I repeat, new disputes—between Panama and the United States.

Some support the treaties chiefly in the belief that they will insure good relations with Panama. However, we have already seen that ambiguities such as the neutrality and priority passage clauses have created friction between the two nations. The financial provisions alone are replete with varying interpretations, all of which could fester into major disputes unless clarified by amendments or in the implementing legislation.

A major provision of the treaties relating to payments for Panama could easily create a serious conflict between the two nations in future years. This results from the fact that Panama is to be paid 30 cents per canal-ton until the year 2000. To finance these and other direct payments to Panama from operating revenues, the Canal Commission will be forced to increase tolls.

In an effort to generate income for these new expenses, it is not unlikely for the Canal Commission to increase tolls to the extent that less traffic transits the canal. Panama would oppose raising tolls to that extent as its payments would be lower due to the reduced tonnage transiting the canal. The question then arises, is the Canal Commission to risk losing traffic to meet its expenses to Panama, or should it meet those expenses through borrowing? Panama would strongly favor borrowing to avoid the tonnage loss, but the United States would hesitate to assume these debts, as in 1999 such debts would have to be paid off from the U.S. Treasury.

Another serious issue left in doubt by the treaties is whether or not the $10 million annual payment to Panama from excess revenues is cumulative. Panama contends it is cumulative, whereas the United States says it is not. This issue, and many others, must be nailed down in order to avoid the very disputes the treaties purport to prevent.

Further, there is the question of whether or not the $10 million annuity to Panama is to be paid from canal tolls or by direct payment from the U.S. Government.

Still another example is the fact that the treaties do not address the quality of the services to be rendered to the new Canal Commission by Panama. Comptroller General Elmer Staats testified:

It is essential to establish standards for those services before they are assumed by Panama.

This involves a $10 million annual payment to Panama, although it is generally recognized Panama's costs to deliver these services will only be about $4.4 million. This is another subsidy to Panama.

The Senate should ponder carefully why these treaties are now being debated on the Senate floor when so many important questions remain unanswered. The Senate must demand all questions be fully answered. Further, the treaties are certain to lead to conflicts with Panama if allowed to stand in their present form.

Mr. President, all of these economic issues are dealt with in greater detail in the excellent report of the Armed Services Committee on its hearings. I invite the attention of my colleagues to that report as well as the hearings. It is my opinion, however, that these problems are so great that only through new negotiations could suitable documents be achieved.

NATIONAL SECURITY ISSUES

Aside from the economic issues, the flaws in these treaties relative to the national security areas were well documented in the Armed Services hearings.

All defense witnesses testified that the canal was vital to our national security in future years. This is even more so the case when our own Navy has shrunk from 976 ships in 1968 to less than half that number today, about 475. At the same time the Soviets have built a huge navy designed to challenge us in the various "choke points" of the world, the Panama Canal being one of the most important.

Mr. President, future Navy commanders cannot develop strategy or base contingency plans on passage through the canal unless that passage is certain. Can we be certain after the year 2000 that our ships can transit the canal in times of emergency? I do not think so.

CANAL CONTROLS CARIBBEAN

The canal is critical to U.S. control of the Caribbean Sea, an important body of water almost at our shores. Our military withdrawal from Panama will greatly hamper the ability of our fleet to control vital passageways in the Caribbean such as the Yucatan Channel, the Mona Passage, and the Windward Passage.

Also, the Senate should be aware that our position at our naval base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba will become even more precarious if these treaties were negotiated in 1903 and efforts to get the United States out of Guantanamo will likely escalate if we hand over the Canal Zone to Panama.

ADMIRAL MOORER ISSUES WARNING

Adm. Thomas Moorer, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, made a strong statement in opposition to the treaties. He disputed the idea the canal could not be defended from internal threats. He also debunked the claim 100,000 troops would be needed to defend the canal terming it a "gross overstatement."

Both Admiral Moorer and Maj. Gen. George Mabry testified there was absolutely no comparison between the Canal Zone and Vietnam. The location of Panama in this hemisphere, the lack of road along its borders, the fact it is a land bridge between two oceans all tend to make military operations there quite different from Vietnam.

Admiral Moorer also seriously questioned the ability of a small nation like Panama to run the canal. He cited Panama's weak economic base, lack of skilled labor and historical political instability as major problems in such a mammoth undertaking.

TORRIJOS-CASTRO CONNECTION

General Torrijos and Fidel Castro make no secret about their friendship and common views. Investigations of the 1964 riots revealed a strong Cuban hand as testified to by General Mabry, the main U.S. Army ground commander during the riots. It is likely that if these treaties are ratified, Cuban and Soviet influence in Panama will grow to an extent the United States cannot be certain of the canal's use in emergencies. Further, if problems develop, any U.S. military action could easily result in a confrontation with Cuba or the Soviets. Such prospects could be avoided if the United States insists on retaining control of the canal.

During testimony on national security matters, former Deputy Secretary of Defense William Clements testified that in 1975 he had negotiated with General Torrijos a security clause insuring U.S. rights of unilateral intervention. Why then—I repeat, why then—has the current administration, in the brief span of about 6 months, junked this clause in favor of the weak and ambiguous "regime of neutrality"?

Administration witnesses claimed in testimony the treaties represent all possible concessions from Panama. Yet a stronger national security provision, agreed to by General Torrijos, was junked. This represents firsthand evidence that the administration failed to get the most favorable agreements possible from Panama.

BASE RIGHTS SURRENDERED

The Senate should also be aware that under these treaties defense of the canal will be costly in lives and resources. The Defense Department sought base rights for well into the 21st century, but the negotiators not only gave up these requirements, they also failed to even establish specified areas for U.S. forces to occupy, should U.S. forces be required to return to the canal after the year 1999. As a minimum, the United States should retain military bases in Panama after the year 2000.

General Mabry told our committee, as one who has had experience enforcing the 1903 Treaty, it was essential that any future agreement be explicit if it is to be effective. These treaties are anything but explicit and are certain to lead to disputes rather than prevent them.

Mr. President, there are many other elements in the treaties which I find totally inconsistent with the best interests of this Nation. These include the following:

The provision prohibiting the United States from even negotiating with another nation the right to build a sea level canal prior to the year 2000, as well as the requirement such a canal be built in Panama if undertaken prior to termination of the main treaty.

The provision which permits passage of ships of nations unfriendly to the United States even in wartime.

The practice of entering into treaties of this import with a dictator who has denied the human rights of his people and demonstrated through fiscal mismanagement he is incapable of responsible leadership.

The assumption by the Senate that the House of Representatives does not have a legitimate role in the disposal of publicly owned property as is the case with the Canal Zone.

The failure of the treaties to adequately provide for maintenance of American cemeteries in the Canal Zone.

The dangers represented by the language difference, Spanish and English, in which the treaties are written.

The abandonment of U.S. citizens and employees in the Panama Canal area to the laws of Panama, the very same laws the Torrijos government has so often ignored when it served their purposes to do so.

Mr. President, these remarks today represent some of my broad concerns relative to these treaties. As the debate progresses, I intend to say more about the specific articles as they are taken up in turn by the Senate acting as a Committee of the Whole.

In conclusion, I find these treaties totally unacceptable for many reasons. The flaws of the treaties are basic and numerous. Even with the Senate acting as a Committee of the Whole, it is my opinion the treaties could not be amended sufficiently to make them in the best interests of the American people. The Senate's responsibility is clear. Our responsibility is not to bail out the President, but to protect the interests of the American people. We can meet that responsibility only by refusing to consent to these treaties.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) is recognized.

MR. GRAVEL. Mr. President, since it first intruded on the Nation's consciousness three quarters of a century ago the Panama Canal has with dogged regularity generated more than its share of high emotion and partisan rancor in American politics. And unlike most other foreign policy disputes, the lines have not been drawn between those who favor a canal and those who oppose it. Americans as a whole consistently have supported the idea of an Isthmian Canal. The controversy has always been not over what we should do, but how we should do it.

That is again the situation today as we open debate on the question whether the Senate should advise and consent to the ratification of the new Panama Canal treaties.

The U.S. public at large still holds to its historical perception that the Panama Canal is an important commercial and defense asset for the United States and the world. But the new treaties now serve to polarize the debate between those for status quo and those for change, the protreaty forces.

Those of us who place ourselves among the latter group, argue that a new treaty which accommodates Panamanian grievances is the surest way of guaranteeing the United States basic interests in the continued fair, efficient, and neutral operation of the canal, the status quo position, on the other hand, emphasizes the legitimacy of U.S. rights assured in the 1903 treaty. Proponents of this position, though willing to fine tune the existing treaty, adamantly oppose a new treaty in accord with the principles of the one now before us. They raise the following particular objections:

First. The new treaty would relinquish U.S. sovereignty in the Canal Zone, thus abandoning U.S. citizens there and diminishing U.S. power and standing abroad.

Second. The new treaty would abandon huge U.S. capital investments in the Canal Zone, which rightfully belong to the American people.

Third. The new treaty would relinquish the U.S. right to operate the canal to the Panamanians, whose political instability and lack of technical and managerial skill make them poor candidates to assume the role so efficiently and impartially performed by the United States for the past 60 years.

Fourth. The new treaty would abandon U.S. citizens in the Canal Zone, who for generations have given their lives to the Canal's construction and operation.

Fifth. The new treaty would threaten hemispheric defense and U.S. security, to which the canal is vital.

Sixth. The new treaty would endanger the U.S. economy by relinquishing operational control of the canal.

Seventh. The new treaty would relinquish an important U.S. right to build a sea-level canal in some other central American country by committing us until the year 2000 to undertake such a project only in Panama.

The validity of these objections to the new treaties is, of course, subject to challenge.

I have concluded that in fact each of these objections is, in one way or another, invalid. I hope to show that this is so. But let me first point out that each of these arguments against the new treaty contains a suppressed premise; namely, that the present treaty is fair and serves U.S. interests. If this premise is false, as I believe the evidence compels us to conclude it is, then all of the above arguments fail as a rationale for maintaining the status quo.

Let us look at the background to the present controversy. Almost from the start, the Panamanians have been dissatisfied with the present treaty. This is not hard to understand. Its terms grant to the United States "in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection" of a canal "of the width of 10 miles." The treaty further grants to the United States "all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned— which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign—to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority." In return for these generous concessions the United States agreed to pay the Republic of Panama $10 million and an annuity during the life of the treaty of $250,000, raised to $1.9 million in 1955 and subsequently adjusted for inflation in 1971 to $2.3 million, which is what we presently pay the Panamanians.

The events immediately preceding and leading up to the conclusion of the 1903 treaty with the Panamanians provide important perspective on the controversy over the new treaties. It is an historical record which, I believe, compels us to conclude that the present treaty arrangement is fundamentally unfair, and hence, that the demands of elemental justice require a redress of Panamanian grievances.

It is, of course, a separate issue whether or not the new treaties do this in a way that preserves U.S. interests. I am convinced they do, and I will point out how in due course. But first, let us take a brief look at history.

In 1902, Congress authorized the President to acquire a specified strip of land and additional rights and territory from Colombia, of which Panama was then a part, for the construction and operation of a ship canal. But negotiations with Colombia fell apart when the Colombian Senate unanimously rejected a proposed treaty as not in her best interests.

Then President Roosevelt took things more into his own hands by sending gunboats to stand offshore while the Panamanians declared their independence. The dust had not been settled when, 3 days later, the Roosevelt Administration hastily recognized the new republic and immediately set about negotiating a canal treaty with a Frenchman named Philippe Bunau-Varilla, who came to Washington from Paris, by way of New York carrying an honorary Panamanian citizenship and the title minister plenipotentiary to the United States.

Bunau-Varilla, who had financial interests in the construction of a Panamanian canal dating from the earlier French effort to join the oceans, had managed by a combination of brazen self-assurance and shrewd maneuvering to have himself appointed to the auspicious post of Panamanian envoy, even though he was a French citizen and had not set foot in Panama for years—almost two decades. At first, the provisional junta of the Government of Panama had been reluctant to accord him such high position, but Bunau-Varilla was not one to be outmaneuvered. He simply withheld funds the junta desperately needed and refused to take any formal actions on the new government's behalf until he had been granted the powers he felt proper to his station. Once they were in hand, he immediately set about taking necessary steps for the negotiation of a canal treaty.

Meanwhile, back in Panama, the members of the junta were taking what they regarded as necessary steps to assure their interests were properly represented by their French minister. They appointed Manuel Amador Guerrero and Federico Boyd delegates of the Republic of Panama and provided them written instructions to carry to Bunau-Varilla. He was to negotiate a treaty, "all causes" of which were to be "previously consulted" with Amador and Boyd.

So it was obviously their specific wish that he would not be able to do anything unilaterally. "You will proceed in everything," the junta directed, "strictly in agreement with them." That is, Amador and Boyd. And the treaty's provisions "must not be any less favorable for Panama than were those of the Hay-Herran treaty for Colombia."

That is very important. That was the intent of the junta at that time, that, minimally, they would not have anything less than what the United States had already signed with the nation of Colombia.

With these documents in hand, the Panamanian delegates sailed for New York on November 10, just 1 week after the uprising.

Bunau-Varilla, having received word of the Amador-Boyd mission, knew his time was short. He arranged to be formally received by President Roosevelt on Friday, November 13. That day, as he left the White House reception, he turned to Secretary of State John Hay and delivered a warning:

For 2 years you have had difficulties in negotiating the canal treaty with the Colombians. Remember that 10 days ago the Panamanians were still Colombians and brought up to use the hairsplitting dialect of Bogota. You have now before you a Frenchman. If you wish to take advantage of a period of clearness, in Panamanian diplomacy, do it now! When I go out, the spirit of Bogota will return.

That is the quote from Philippe Bunau-Varilla to the Secretary of State of the United States of America about another country for which he had no citizenship.

Hay acknowledged that he understood and promised an early draft of a treaty that he would deliver to Bunau-Varilla.

The Frenchman did not have long to wait. On Sunday the 15th Hay's draft was delivered to his room at no other place than the Willard Hotel, right down the street. It was essentially the Hay-Herran Treaty with a few minor changes. Bunau-Varilla set to work feverishly. He felt the Hay-Herran Treaty carried the stigma of the long struggle with Colombia and must be changed. As he himself was to write later:

I reached the conclusion that in order to succeed it was necessary to draft a new treaty so well adapted to the American requirements that it could defy any criticism in the Senate.

The amounts were to remain the same—a flat $10 million plus a $250,000 annuity—but the zone was to be increased from 10 kilometers to 10 miles, and it was to be "granted," not leased, to the United States "in perpetuity." Moreover, the United States was to be given even greater attributes of sovereignty than in the Hay-Herran Treaty, which, I want to say, was unanimously turned down by the Colombia Senate.

Even though this was the very point on which the Colombians regurgitated.

By 10 o'clock on the night of the 16th, which is now Monday, Bunau-Varilla, in his hotel room, had finished his task. Despite the late hour, he proceeded to Hay's home. On finding it darkened, he had to return the next morning.

On November 17 he presented Hay his draft and expressed his willingness to sign either it or the draft Hay had given him, however he expressed a preference for his draft because it "has the advantage of conferring upon the United States in broad and general terms the rights she is entitled to have * * *."

Time was now precious, indeed, as Amador and Boyd had arrived that very morning in New York, Tuesday morning. They had been delayed 1 day, but on the 18th the Panamanians would be in Washington to instruct their minister. On the night of the 17th Bunau-Varilla informed Hay that he wished to sign the treaty the next day before Amador and Boyd arrived in Washington. He stated:

So long as the delegation has not arrived in Washington, I shall be free to deal with you alone, provided with complete confidence and absolute powers. When they arrive, I shall no longer be alone. In fact, I may perhaps no longer be here at all.

We can begin to sense the drama here of days and hours of moving forward on this crucial document on which we place such sanctity and justice and morality.

Alone, Hay was more than willing to accommodate.

After a hurried meeting the next day, that morning, with a group of influential Senators, he requested Bunau-Varilla to call at his home at 6 p.m.

There, at 6:40 in the evening, November 18, 1903, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty was signed in the Secretary's private home—not at the State Department or some official place, in the Secretary's private home.

In fact, the Secretary had to use his own signet ring as a seal. Not a single Panamanian was present or had ever laid eyes on the document that was being signed in their behalf.

Bunau-Varilla had achieved his goal none too soon. That very evening at 10 o'clock, now mind, the treaty was signed at 6:40 in haste, at 10 o'clock, Amador and Boyd arrived at Union Station from New York. When Bunau-Varilla met the train, document in hand, and gave them the news of the signing, Amador almost passed out, for obvious reasons.

The next day, the Panamanian delegates who had the real power attempted to reopen negotiations with the Department of State. They obviously failed.

Hay, not to mention Bunau-Varilla, had now turned their attentions to getting the treaty ratified. Both men entreated the Panamanian delegates to ratify the documents on the spot, but they demurred, insisting they had no such authority.

So on November 24, Bunau-Varilla dispatched the treaty to Panama by boat. He then pressured the junta to ratify it immediately upon arrival, suggesting darkly—and we can just feel the flavor of the situation—suggesting darkly that if they did not act with dispatch, the Colombians might make a better treaty and leading the United States to withdraw its support.

Although the Roosevelt administration had no such intention, rumors were abroad in Panama that Colombia might get—try to retain its lost territory and the junta feared the worst. In fact, they had to fear for their very lives, because the gunboats, to leave the shores, obviously, the Colombian troops would come back, and what do you think would happen to the junta? They would be promptly executed.

So when these people were pressured, they were not pressured with niceties of the international byplays. They were pressured with their very lives at stake.

So on November 26, with that element of duress at their backs, they cabled their willingness to ratify the treaty as soon as it arrived.

Now, mind, they had not even read the document, but they cabled back they would sign it as soon as it got there.

Six days later, on December 2, they did so, signed the treaty, having had the 31-page document for only 20 hours, and at that, only the English version and nobody in the junta could read English.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to.

Mr. CHURCH. Under similar circumstances, would not the Senator have signed it even if he could not read it?

Mr. GRAVEL. If it is my life for a signature, obviously it is my signature you get with very great ease.

I may not like it and I may spend the rest of my life trying to get this great injustice corrected. It is like a person making a contract.

If I went over to the Senator right now with a gun and said, "Sign your name on a deed to your house right now that you have here in Washington, if you don't, I will blow your brains out," you are going to sign the deed.

Under American law, we have recourse in not delivering the house, but under international law we do not have those niceties.

Mr. CHURCH. I had a father-in-law who used to practice law in the mountains of Idaho. As a young man, he said he often wondered what he would do if he ever had to look into a gun barrel. He said he found out one afternoon when a deranged farmer came in, pulled a pistol and said, "Turn around, put your hands up and lean against the wall."

He turned around, put his hands up and leaned against the wall.

This was what the Panamanians were up against when they felt constrained to sign a treaty they had not negotiated and could not read. They were up against the wall. Small wonder that, in the years that have followed, they have sought to correct this wrong. And they have made a little headway. From time to time, rectifications have been made in the original treaty, minor rectifications. Nevertheless, the Panamanians have persisted, pressed on by their sense of outrage, their sense of diminished nationhood, their sense of pride. So now we come to the final rectification of that wrong. This is how we ought to judge these treaties.

A big power that can be generous enough to correct a wrong is a great power. To make amends is not a sign of weakness. It is a sign of strength. To do right is never wrong. But to hold that our might makes right would be to repeat again the mistake of 1903 in a world that has changed completely.

The Panama Canal Zone is the only strip of foreign territory, the only strip of land, that we hold anywhere in the world against the will of the inhabitants.

That may have been customary back in Teddy Roosevelt's time—indeed, that was the pattern—but the old empires are gone. The old colonies have given way to new, independent governments throughout the world.

We still retain territories abroad, to be sure: the Virgin Islands, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam and American Samoa in the Pacific. But in none of these cases do we hold the land against the will of the people. The day that a majority of the Puerto Ricans vote in a free election to be independent, that day, if I am here, I will stand up on the floor of the Senate and say, "Grant them their independence; they are entitled to it, if that is what they want"—even as we were entitled to it, though we had to fight a revolutionary war to obtain it, 200 years ago.

Only the Panama Canal Zone, obtained from the Panamanians in a situation in which they either had to accept our terms or face a Colombian firing squad—only that strip of land in all the world—do we hold against the will of the people of that little country.

That can be rectified by these treaties, by an act of generosity that will enhance our stature throughout the world, not weaken it, and, in addition, will help to improve our relations with our neighbors south of our borders; for in this they are all agreed: that Panama is right in its claim to a restoration of its sovereign rights in the Panama Canal Zone. The world is agreed.

The Senator may recall, not so long ago, in the Security Council of the United Nations, that the question of the Panama Canal Zone came up. Even our trusted allies would not stand with us, not one of them. Not a country anywhere would uphold the proposition that we were entitled to keep this zone against the will of the people of the country. For this is the very definition of colonialism; it is a part of a past which is dead.

So it was that we had to veto the resolution in the Security Council. Ours was the single dissenting vote. Not one other member of the Council voted with us.

Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation." Even 200 years ago, he understood the importance of showing a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. How can we be blind to such considerations in this case?

I commend the Senator for going back and retracing the history, because it underscores the fact that the United States is big enough to rectify a wrong and strong enough to do right.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I thank my colleague, because I believe he has touched upon what is the most important element in these deliberations on the treaty. We will go into a lot of the argument about the economics and defense and all those facets of it, but I think the most important thing for us as a nation is to be just and to be fair.

Too often, we measure strength, as the Senator has pointed out, by might, muscle, aircraft carriers, nuclear capability. That is not the strength of the United States of America. Our strength is our moral strength. It is our ability to give an example to the world as to the kind of people we are, and I think we are a very fair people.

I believe that when the facts are known, the American people will rally to this new change in establishing justice toward the Panamanian people.

Let us look at the matter of justice with respect to the treaty. As I already have indicated, any reasonable effort to come to terms with the objections to a new treaty raised by status quo forces must first of all assess the overall fairness of the existing agreement. If, upon examination, we are forced to the conclusion that the 1903 Treaty is fundamentally unfair, then surely we must abandon our objections to requesting it in more equitable terms.

Quite frankly, the more I have learned of the history of our present relationship with Panama, the more I am convinced that we must come to that simple, elemental decision of being just and that justice is lacking from the present equation.

The historical record is unequivocal on this point. Our own Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, at the time described the treaty as "vastly advantageous to the United States and not so advantageous to Panama."

These inequitable arrangements, moreover, were effectively imposed under a state of duress. Panama's very existence as a nation hung in the balance between her consent to the treaty and continued U.S. protection from Colombia.

As I stated earlier, her leadership, the gentlemen who were part of the junta, feared for their lives. She was encouraged to believe that without the one—that is, having the treaty with the United States—the other, her very independence, would fall asunder. Under such circumstances, she was pressured to ratify the treaty virtually sight unseen.

Panama's agent and spokesman in all of this was a Frenchman who failed at almost every turn to act in the Panamanian interests. Their rights were, therefore alienated by a man not even their countryman, acting purely in his own self-interest, and who repeatedly engaged in deceit to seek approval for actions detrimental to the Panamanian national interests.

What is more, U.S. officials at the time were aware of and therefore complicitous in these injustices. President Roosevelt so characterized it in 1911, when he stated: "I took the Isthmus," and a statement upon which he later elaborated by explaining, "I took the Isthmus because Bunau-Varilla brought it to me on a silver platter."

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CHURCH. It was indeed a silver platter. I believe, following the consummation of the treaty, that Bunau-Varilla said, "I have served the French well"—not the Panamanians mind you, but the French.

Indeed, the French had a big interest at stake. Having tried and failed to build the canal, they had spent an enormous fortune in the effort. The United States paid the French company $40 million to acquire the machinery, the buildings and the uncompleted works of the French company on the Isthmus.

Mr. Bunau-Varilla was a big stockholder in that company. This was the man who negotiated for the Panamanians, whose whole connection and financial interest and, by his own admission, whose motivation, was to serve the French; to recoup what he could for them and for himself. Is it any wonder that there has been a smoldering resentment through the years in Panama?

Mr. GRAVEL. As a footnote to history, it is interesting to note that the charter that the French company had, or the new company that was reorganizing, was to expire in a year. That was the charter with Colombia. With a new republic, probably no legal charter would have been involved.

So they would not have had to pay the French company and French stockholders—I might say not all were French stockholders. There were quite a number of American stockholders who did quite well in that enterprise—that $40 million that was paid through an American investment house in New York.

So I think it is difficult to get to the bottom of it. But if it could be aired with any finality, and scholars are laboring in this regard, I think it would be most interesting and I think a most disgusting page in American history.

I think we must try to put ourselves in the Panamanians' shoes, to see it as they do. The best way I know to do this is to cite an analogy which has great currency in Panama. It has been succinctly stated by Wayne D. Bray. It goes like this:

To get an idea of how this situation looks to the people of Panama in 1977, imagine a strip of land extending 5 miles on each side of the Mississippi River within which a foreign power, by virtue of treaty rights granted under suspicious circumstances in 1783, exercises complete control as "if it were sovereign" and through which a resident of Illinois must pass to go to Missouri, during which passage he is subject to arrest by a foreign power and trial in a foreign court under a foreign system of laws.

Just imagine. I wonder how Americans would tolerate such a situation within our borders. That is exactly what the situation is in Panamanian borders.

The United States is a superpower and, of course, the Panamanians do not have much choice because they are one of the weakest nations in the world. Our military forces stationed in the Canal Zone are equal in size to Panama's entire national guard. It is really not much of a match.

On their side the Panamanians have only logic. They ask us to approve a new treaty. They point out that total U.S. control over a portion of Panamanian territory is a vestige of colonialism. They ask us to understand how it offends their national honor and pride as a people to have a U.S. police force, U.S. courts, and U.S. jails enforcing U.S. laws on Panamanian citizens within their own country. How it offends their pride. They show us how total U.S. control over land area in the Canal Zone limits the urban growth of their two largest cities, how U.S. control of all deepwater port facilities restricts the productivity of their country.

I was horrified when I found out that their ports, the best they have in their country, they do not even have access to. It is ours. It is the United States of America that has their ports. And how U.S. commissaries unfairly compete with local businessmen.

What Member of this body has not had a delegation from his State, from communities next to military bases, talking about the commissary problems? I think there is some knowledge and sympathy as to what is happening to the people of Panama, the business community of Panama, in this regard.

How do we answer these charges?

The most common way of justifying the present treaty arrangements is to cite the benefits which have accrued to Panama, not what we have taken from them but what we have given them.

Obviously, the most important of these, it can be conceded, is her independence.

We say this unfortunately with a certain arrogance. They would not have a country if it were not for us.

Without the United States where would they be? Admittedly, that is essentially what happened. We guaranteed at a point in time that they were able to become independent. But I think to be fair, we must recognize that they hankered for their freedom for some three-quarters of a century before our gunboats showed up on the scene. They had quite a few efforts of revolution before that. So, they were not johnnie-come-latelys at thirsting for freedom and independence. There is no question that their freedom is a great blessing. What is doubtful is that this justifies an arrangement under which she signed away "in perpetuity" the most important part of her birthright. To say that it does is like saying that the United States should be forever indebted to France, without whom our own revolution could never have succeeded.

And I think if you want to look close at history, you would know that we would not be a free country today had it not been for the support of France, a royal government at that time.

This is history now.

And the United States has profited immensely in the interim. The relevance of that history for today is that it shows the very structure of the relationship from the beginning was one in which we consciously took advantage of the Panamanians. All the real sacrifices were on their side. They yielded up, forever, their nation's greatest resource—the land over which the canal was constructed. What should have been theirs became ours.

Some would suggest that Panama has been adequately compensated for this "use" of her territory by the $10 million the United States paid when the treaty was signed, plus the annuity she has been granted since. The facts belie the truth of this assertion, however, the annuity, for years set at $250,000 per annum, is today only $2.3 million per year; $2.3 million is what we now give Panama for its birthright. This is a mere pittance when compared, for instance, with the Panama Canal Company's fiscal year 1976 total operating revenues of more than $250 million. What is more, the U.S. Government has always set Panama Canal tolls at a breakeven level. The Panama Canal Company does not lose money, but neither does it make a profit.

This revenue policy of the Panama Canal Company has been analyzed by International Research Associates, IRA, of Palo Alto, Calif., and I believe—I will not assert here with certainty—but I believe that analysis was paid for by the Panama Canal Company, so I think we could assume that this is an objective study.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The committee has asked for figures showing the total payment to Panama since the United States commenced operations there in 1903. The Senator has alluded to the $10 million initial payment under the terms of the treaty and the annual payments since.

These payments total about $66 million, to be exact, $66,600,992. That is the total since 1903, which is nearly 75 years ago.

It comes to less than $1 million a year for a tract of land running right through the middle of the country, 10 miles wide and 40 miles long, good productive land.

I ask the Senator if he would not like to obtain property 10 miles wide and 40 miles long—a good big chunk of land, bigger than some countries in this world for less than $1 million a year?

Mr. GRAVEL. I might say to my colleague from Idaho that in the real estate parlance we might call it a steal.

Mr. CHURCH. Perhaps. Now, when I hear opponents of the treaty say that we are paying the Panamanians a fortune to take the canal I think back over that long period of time when they received less than a million dollars a year for the rights we exercised in this Canal Zone, 10 miles wide and 40 miles long, which bisects their little country. The provisions of these treaties help to rectify that wrong; because the $40 million that Panama will receive will be taken out of the tolls of the canal itself, which incidentally are only 9 cents a ton above what they were when we opened the canal in 1914, $1.29 now compared with $1.20 then.

I mean it is amazing, when you consider how much the dollar has depreciated. The United States has subsidized the maritime fleets of the world by holding that toll down to a level barely above what it was when we opened the canal in 1914.

Mr. GRAVEL. Would the Senator state that again? I think it is a preposterous situation.

Mr. CHURCH. Well, it is preposterous; and who has been the beneficiary of all this? Not the American taxpayers. No, indeed. The beneficiaries have been the maritime fleets, subsidized all these years because of our refusal to impose a fee commensurate with the value of the passage.

As the Senator knows, our maritime fleet has grown smaller and smaller, so the principal beneficiaries have been the foreign-flag fleets of the world.

So why should we be upset at the prospect of a modest increase in the fare?

Mr. GRAVEL. Still less than the fuel that it takes.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes. It is modest. And if it generates the revenue that will enable the Panamanians to receive a $40 million payment from the canal each year, then this will go far toward rectifying the parsimonious payments of the past.

I say this again underscores the reason we should ratify these treaties: Because they are right. I just have no respect for that particular attitude which holds: "Let us be weak with the strong, but strong with the weak." If there was ever a time for us to be generous, it is when we are dealing with this little country, trying to work out an arrangement that will be acceptable to the Panamanians, protect the interests of the United States, and make for an orderly transition stretching out to the end of this century.

Mr. LAXALT. Will Senator Church yield for a question?

Mr. CHURCH. I do not have the floor.

Mr. GRAVEL. I have the floor.

Mr. LAXALT. Do you mind if I ask Senator Church a question concerning the financial deprivation of the Panamanians all these years?

Mr. GRAVEL. I think, in view of the fact that I have just received the floor here at almost 6 o'clock, I would like to finish my statement. If you want to make a brief observation——

Mr. LAXALT. Just one short observation, prompted by Senator Church here. I do not want to take all your time, but I would not want to leave the impression that the total benefit to the Panamanians under the present treaty has been $66 million. I would suggest that the Senator inquire as to the $250 million that our facilities there have pumped into the Panamanian economy. There is no question about that, is there, Senator Church?

Mr. CHURCH. Let me just say to the Senator that I have never pretended that our presence and our payrolls there have not had an economic impact upon Panama.

Mr. LAXALT. Substantial economic impacts.

Mr. CHURCH. Of course they have. But——

Mr. LAXALT. To the point that the Panamanians now, their living standards are No. 1 in that part of the world, and No. 4 in all of Latin America, due almost entirely to the presence of the Panama Canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. If the Senator will permit the repetition of an analogy made earlier, if I hold you up at gun point and take your home away from you, and I turn around and give you a job in the house, am I then entitled to say, "Aren't you lucky I gave you a job?"

Mr. LAXALT. Considering how the Panamanians have done over the years, I would love to have that job.

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, I do not think we have done such a hot job. Who is to say they would not have prospered even more with the management of their own assets and their own canal? Who is to say that 10 years later on, someone else would not have come along and built it?

Mr. LAXALT. The point is, had we not done it then it would not have happened there; that canal would have been built in Nicaragua.

Mr. GRAVEL. History shows there was an earthquake in Nicaragua, and had we gone ahead and constructed it there, we would have looked like fools.

Mr. LAXALT. I suggest that history does not support you. But I would not want the record to show that Panama's arrangement with our country has been a poor one financially. To the contrary, it has been extremely beneficial.

Mr. GRAVEL. I beg to differ with you. If you look at our standard of living and look at their standard of living, theirs is considerably less than ours. It is around $1,000 per capita, or $800 per capita. So when you say to someone, when you have taken his birthright, "Why, you are well off," while I walk around in a $200 suit and he has got rags, and tell him, "You should be happy with the rags I gave you," oh, no. That does not wash at all.

Mr. CHURCH. In any case, I would point out to the Senator that the benefit from investments we have made in the Canal Zone is one question, whereas our payments to the Government of Panama under the rights we exercise in the Canal Zone is quite a different one. The figures I have given accurately reflect what we paid the Panamanians for exercising complete possession and control of the Canal Zone.

I think any good realtor would agree that if you can acquire a stretch of land 10 miles wide and 40 miles long under an arrangement that requires you to pay less than a million dollars a year, you have a good deal.

Mr. GRAVEL. The real estate terminology on that is a steal, not a deal.

Mr. CHURCH. Very well.

Mr. LAXALT. I object to that terminology. If the Senator would permit me to make an additional observation, under the terms of this—

Mr. GRAVEL. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senators will suspend for a moment, the Chair would remind the Senators it is getting into the shank of the afternoon, and perhaps the Senate might suspend for the evening in a little bit. The Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) has the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, is this like the 2-minute warning in a football game?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes that this is perhaps the most volatile of issues, but would not want Senators to stray away from the issue at hand.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I apologize, maybe, for the lack of decorum in my distinguished colleagues, whom I have great reverence for, and understanding, but I was just trying to make a point with respect to the paltry sum of money we have been paying the Panamanians over the years, by comparison. I was going to elaborate upon a study by a firm in Palo Alto called International Research Associates. The study that they did was entitled "The Economic Value Of The Panama Canal."

The study concludes that over the past 60 years (PCC) has chosen to operate the canal as an international public utility and has followed a revenue policy which just provides for recovery of annual costs, including depreciation of tangible assets, and a moderate rate of interest on investment funds originally advanced by the U.S. Treasury. The effect of this policy has been to produce a surplus to users of an amount equal to the difference between the maximum possible revenues recoverable under an alternative tolls policy and the breakeven costs actually recovered. The IRA study projects that for 1975 the magnitude of the surplus would be equal to approximately 55 percent of the revenue recovered under present toll structures. Applying this to the IRA-projected 1975 toll revenue figure of $119.5 million, we see that the surplus which could have been recovered was on the order of another $65.5 million. The benefits of this surplus, rather than going to the people of Panama, now accrue to three groups: First, those who purchase commodities that pass through the canal assuming they are passed on to them; second, those who produce such commodities assuming the maritime interests pass it on to those people; and third, those who move the commodities from producers to purchasers. Rightfully, this $65.5 million should have gone to Panama as its earnings on its fundamental resource.

To better appreciate the significance this $65.5 million could have had for Panama, it is worth noting some additional statistics. In 1975 the total revenues of Panama's central government were only $462 million; an additional $65.5 million would have increased the national budget by 14 percent. Still another way to look at this figure is in relation to Panama's debt-service costs, which constitute a crippling drain on the national economy. In 1975 international and external debt service was $64.8 million, or approximately the same as the toll revenue Panama lost due to policies pursued by the United States. Finally, the $65.5 million for just 1 year, which to my mind they were due, may be compared with the total direct income as Senator Church stated earlier, Panama has, in fact, received from the canal since the inception of the treaty. That figure is only $67 million for the entire life of the canal, including the initial $10 million payment.

Imagine that. We gave the French company $40 million for their interests which would have expired with Colombia within a year and which were dubiously legal with the new Panamanian Government. We gave them $40 million at one fell swoop which went through an American company's coffers in New York, and we have given since then, in the 60-odd years, $66 million.

As startling as these figures are, they probably do not give the true picture of the revenue Panama has forfeited through U.S. operation of the canal. This is so because the operating expenses of the Panama Canal Company include not only actual costs of running the canal, but also large subsidies for education and other social services for Canal Zone employees, even though these employees pay Federal taxes for that purpose.

They pay taxes for their education, but the education is paid from the tolls of the canal.

For instance, included in the PCC's 1975 operating expenses is $23.5 million for functioning of the Canal Zone Government. While not all such expenses could be eliminated through Panamanian operation of the canal, substantial savings could be expected through the integration of duplicative governmental functions on the one hand and the introduction of free market efficiencies to replace certain present governmental responsibilities on the other. Great inflation in costs associated with the Panama Canal appear to arise from the fact that its operation is not integrated with the local economy. The Panama Canal Company maintains an entire governmental and economic infrastructure, which cannot help but be inefficient. Clearly, there is a great deal of slack in the Panamanian operation.

One final way to measure the economic injustice of the present annuity arrangements is to examine what we pay for use of military facilities around the world. Recently the United States and Spain signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation which grants the United States the right to use military facilities at Torrejon, Zaragoza, and Moron air bases; the Rota naval bases; the Bardenas Reales firing range; and 18 other minor installations. In turn, the United States guaranteed Spain 190 million dollars' worth of military grants and credits over the 5-year life of the treaty, a far cry from in perpetuity.

Similarly, in 1947 we entered into a 99-year, rent-free agreement with the Philippines for the use of Clark Airfield, Subic Bay, and the Naval air station at Cubi Point. In 1959 we found it necessary to renegotiate this agreement, at which time we agreed that it should have a term of 25 years. We are now renegotiating it again, and while no agreement has yet been reached, discussions have centered around a proposal for a 5-year treaty, in return for which we would provide $1 billion, split equally between economic and military aid. These agreements may be compared with the $2.3 million annuity we pay Panama for the use of the canal and the land on which military bases are authorized. We have never compensated Panama for our military presence.

It can, of course, be argued that Panama has received extensive indirect economic benefits from the canal, as stated earlier, as well as improved health conditions, sanitary facilities, etc., all of which must be taken into account in assessing the present treaty. All these things are indisputably true, but they completely miss the point. They alone cannot make the arrangement either just or unjust. It is unjust by the fact that it prevents Panama from reaping the economic advantage of her primary resource. Moreover, it does so almost gratuitously. Panama could be returned the control over her resource without it materially affecting our own economic or strategic interests. In truth, our strength and greatness will lie not in continuing to demean ourselves by insisting upon some legalistic interpretation of our "rights," but in recognizing that an injustice has been done and acting to correct it. It is time we quit priding ourselves on how much we have done for the Panamanians in order that we may see what we took from them in the process.

SOVEREIGNTY

The most confused, but perhaps the most popular, objection raised against abrogation of the 1903 treaty is that to do so would entail relinquishing sovereignty over territory that is as much a part of the United States as the territory acquired by the Louisiana purchase or my home territory of Alaska purchased from Russia.

Nothing could be more wrong. In the language of the treaty, the United States is granted certain rights which are described as the sort the United States would have "if it were the sovereign." Surely, the commonsense meaning of this is that the United States is not the sovereign. This contrasts markedly with the treatment of sovereignty in the cases of Louisiana and Alaska. In 1803 France ceded the Louisiana Territory to the United States "forever and in full sovereignty." All public lands were transferred and all inhabitants were given U.S. citizenship.

The same is true in the case of Alaska. Russia ceded the United States all its territory on the American continent, including all rights and privileges previously belonging to Russia. Inhabitants were given the choice of returning to Russia within 3 years or becoming U.S. citizens. In neither case was provision made for an annuity or any other sort of continuing relationship regarding matters covered in the agreement.

Three additional points may be cited as evidence that the United States does not have the attribute of sovereignty in the Canal Zone:

First. A person born in the Canal Zone of Panamanian parents is a U.S. citizen, as he or she would be if born in Louisiana or Alaska.

Second. The exercise of power and authority by the United States in the Canal Zone is dependent upon the use to which the territory is put. If it ceased to be used for the operation of a canal, jurisdiction would revert to Panama.

Third, the United States has no authority to cede the Canal Zone to a third sovereign power, as it obviously would if the territory were its own.

Let us now look at economic importance of the canal. Despite widespread impressions to the contrary, the Panama Canal is not of any great economic significance to the United States. It is often said that approximately 70 percent of canal traffic either originates or terminates in U.S. ports, thus making the canal vital to the U.S. economy. While this figure is correct, the manner in which it is usually presented tends to misrepresent the truth. The "approximately 70 percent" figure is derived by adding the 40 percent of cargo tonnage originating in the United States to the 28 percent terminating here. But it is incorrect then to conclude that the United States accounts for 68 percent of the tonnage passing through the canal. The United States, both as shipper and receiver, is on only one end of the transaction. Therefore this figure must be halved, revealing that only 34 percent, or one-third, of all canal cargo is U.S. oriented.

But even this figure does not provide a proper measure of the economic importance of the canal. We have to ask, 34 percent of what? If the Panama Canal is largely not used, then the fact that 34 percent of its use is attributable to the United States becomes rather meaningless.

The United States is, in fact, the major user of the canal, but many alternative trade routes now exist for the most important products and commodities, and more would become economically competitive if the canal were closed. In terms of overall importance, the canal is much more significant to certain Latin American countries, particularly those on the west coast of South America, than it is to the United States. For instance, in 1972, only 16.8 percent of U.S. waterborne commerce passed through the canal. For Nicaragua, the figure was 76.8 percent, for Panama 29.4 percent, for Peru 41.3 percent, for Chile 34.3 percent, and for Colombia 32.5 percent.

Increasingly, the Panama Canal is becoming outmoded. Larger and faster ships, plus innovations such as container technology, are making the canal outmoded.

The shipbuilding industry, in constructing supertankers, increasingly discount the canal. In fact, 76 percent of the world tanker tonnage today cannot go through the Panama Canal.

The total world tonnage is already above 50 percent in its inability to go through the Panama Canal. In fact, the figure is somewhere around 54 percent of the world tonnage that cannot go through the present Panama Canal. This has been a drastic change in the last 10 years.

Increasingly, the Panama Canal is becoming outmoded. Larger and faster ships, as well as innovations such as container technology, are making alternatives to the canal more and more attractive. The shipbuilding industry—in constructing supertankers—increasingly discounts the canal, which cannot handle their size. More than half the world's tonnage is already too large for the canal.

The most meaningful perspective from which to view the economic value of the canal is an assessment of the impact it has on the total U.S. and world economy.

At present only 5 percent of total annual world seaborne trade transits the Panama Canal. According to the IRA study on "the economic value of the Panama Canal," if the canal were to be closed through an act of sabotage or some other means, the total impact on the world economy for the decade 1975-85 would be only $100 million per annum. Of this amount, the U.S. share would be only $34 million annually. In our trillion dollar-plus economy, which exports in excess of $100 billion a year, this impact is utterly trivial.

This minimal impact of complete loss of the canal must be counterpoised against the harm which this volatile issue can cause in our relationship with all of Latin America, and in fact the entire Third World.

The minor economic benefit which accrues to us from the canal would certainly be more than offset by the hostility we may engender by failing to resolve the canal issue in a way viewed as equitable by the world community. Even the strictly economic effect alone would surely be in excess of $34 million. This does not mean that the Panama Canal is of no importance. It is now and will continue to be for some time into the future a convenient means for waterborne transport. But in the words of the IRA study, "It cannot in any sense be regarded as either overwhelming or crucial."

THE ZONE AND THE ZONIANS

The Panama Canal Zone is surely the biggest company town to be found anywhere in the world. It consists of a 10-mile-wide swath of land, running the full 50-mile width of this small country. Its 400 square miles is the heartland and most valuable economic area of Panama. But it contains no Panamanian enterprises, no Panamanian farms, and no Panamanian officials. It is wholly controlled and administered by the United States, in the corporate person of the Panama Canal Company/Government. It has its own Governor, its own courts, its own police force, its own transportation facilities, its own housing units, and its own public utilities. It also operates its own retail stores, food service units, gasoline stations, theaters, and bowling alleys. It is, in fact, a colonial-socialist enclave under the American flag.

U.S. citizens have resided in the Canal Zone for three generations now. Understandably, they do not want to give up their life there. But just as certainly, the present arrangements cannot be allowed to continue. First of all, the socialistic enclave of the zone cannot be squared with our own commitment to a free enterprise economy as the most efficient and democratic social structure. In addition, the zone constitutes a direct affront to the national integrity of Panama, which cannot with honor tolerate a foreign governmental and legal structure imposed upon its people. The U.S. citizens who live in the zone will, of course, have to be protected. As individuals they are not responsible for the actions of their Government. They have acted in good faith in accepting the arrangements which exist today, and it would be unfair to leave them without recourse. In all probability, when the Canal Zone and its operation are returned to the Panamanians, these Americans will find suitable employment and living arrangements under Panamanian auspices. But should they be unable to, or should any of them choose not to, provision should be made for their relocation to the United States with a guarantee for appropriate new employment, job training, and vested retirement.

The guarantees that these Americans who are in Panama should receive, guarantees along these lines have been set out in the treaty, and I am confident the Congress will be quite liberal in its dealings with the Canal Zone citizens.

While even this will no doubt be somewhat unsettling to these 3,000 or 4,000 individuals, it is the only way that we can reasonably proceed as a matter of national policy.

OPERATION OF THE CANAL

Americans are understandably proud of their role over the last 70-some-odd years in the construction and operation of the Panama Canal. When the canal was built at the beginning of the century it was the engineering marvel of the day, much as the Moon landing is in our own time. And since its completion in 1914, the canal has been efficiently and impartially operated for the benefit of the whole world.

SUMMARY

The ultimate ratification of the treaties before us is dependent, first of all, upon the perceptions of the American and Panamanian people. Panamanians are convinced that the Canal rightfully is theirs, and that for years they have been dealt with unfairly by the United States, which has used her great power and the preemptory provisions of a 70-year-old treaty to treat them as second-class citizens within their own country. Americans, on the other hand, are inclined to believe that the canal belongs to the United States, that it is vital to our interests, and that if anything, Panamanian agitation over the issue in recent years proves that Panama cannot be trusted to run the canal alone. Clearly, for both parties it is a very emotional issue and one in which national pride plays no small part. But when the emotion is stripped away, the Panamanians have the better side of the argument, as I am convinced most Americans would agree if they only had the facts. Be that as it may, after a careful examination of the case, I find the following conclusions compelling:

First. The Panamanians are justified in their demand that we relinquish the canal to their control, and we perpetuate an historic injustice so long as we fail to do so.

Second. The United States in no legal sense owns the Canal Zone; we would not be forfeiting U.S. territory to return its control to Panama.

Third. The economic value of the canal is miniscule in terms of the entire U.S. or world economy; failure to resolve the canal issue in fact causes us great economic harm by exacerbating relations with the third world.

Fourth. The Canal Zone, as currently operated, is a colonial-socialistic enclave and thus incommensurate with the American taxpayers' ideals and national goals.

Fifth. The canal, while still militarily significant, is by no means vital to our national defense. It is almost indefensible against either sabotage or overt attack, and military contingency plans must allow for its blockage at any time.

Sixth. The Panamanians could assume operation of the canal in a very few years; they could easily contract for any skills they do not already possess.

Seventh. The construction of a sea-level canal across Panama appears to be a very viable and cost-effective alternative for moving Alaskan oil and gas surpluses to markets on the east and gulf coast. Such a canal could also save the United States costly new investment in energy supply infrastructures, provide important foreign policy flexibility, and greatly enhance our defense capability while simultaneously reducing defense costs. These advantages which could accrue to the United States through construction of a sea-level canal make it well worth our while to maintain the good will of the Panamanians, which I feel certain can be done if we ratify the new treaties. I therefore hope the Senate will vote affirmatively on the question of advising and consenting to the ratification of the treaties.

Mr. GARN. Will the Senator yield for one quick question?

Mr. GRAVEL. One quick question.

Mr. GARN. The Senator speaks of this great moral degradation of a country that I have listened to and which I cannot accept, and how badly we have treated Panama. I just ask the question, with the unbelievable beauty of the State of Alaska, its fantastic resources, should we not renegotiate with the Soviet Union? Because we bought this from them, I think, for $7 million—all legal, no doubt about it.

If we talk about moralism and something we ought to redress, I would suggest that, from the military standpoint, the Soviets might like to have it back. It is rather strategic. It is a fantastic State; $7 million for Alaska and we have not ripped off the Soviet Union?

Mr. GRAVEL. We bought Alaska.

Mr. GARN. For $7 million.

Mr. GRAVEL. A good deal. I am sure they regret it every day.

Mr. GARN. That is called a steal in real estate terms. I say to the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. It sure is. The only difference is that we do not continue to pay them an annuity, which is proof of the fact that we do not have sovereignty.

Mr. GARN. Oh, but did we rip them off, though.

Mr. GRAVEL. If my colleague will indulge me, I shall answer his question and go on with my statement.

It is very simple. If the Senator cannot understand what I just put forth here in the legal argument of the difference between the Alaska and the Louisiana purchases and the Canal Zone, then the Senator is entitled to his views. I do not share them. I shall go on with my statement.

Mr. GARN. I say to the Senator, I did not address myself to the legal issue. I am sure it was purchased legally. That is not what I am debating. I am talking about the moralistic aspect the Senator from Alaska was talking about, how we were ripping off the Panamanians and have done so since 1904. I am saying that with what we got for $7 million, we ripped off the Russians like nobody in the history of this Earth and we should go back because of this moralistic feeling.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska (Mr. Gravel) has the floor.

Mr. GRAVEL. The big difference is when we signed a treaty for the purchase of Alaska, a Russian signed it. When we signed the treaty that permitted us to act as sovereigns in Panama, a Frenchman signed it and not one Panamanian had seen it.

Mr. GARN. The Senator is not responding to my question.

Mr. GRAVEL. I shall be happy to go back to my statement.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senators to speak one at a time and observe the normal routine of yielding.

Will the Senator from Alaska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield for a brief question.

Mr. SARBANES. Of course, Manhattan was bought from the Indians for $24. We can go through the whole chronology of American history. The important thing is that the United States is in a situation where we have to have a continuing relationship with the Republic of Panama and with the Panamanian people if we are to most effectively make use of the Panama Canal. We have not, in effect, taken over that entire country and incorporated it into the United States, as we have incorporated other areas that have been acquired into the States of the Union. Therefore, we have a continuing relationship. It is pertinent to that continuing relationship, it seems to me, to understand the history of it, if for no other reason than to gain an understanding of the attitudes and the feelings of the Panamanian people.

Members of this body may differ on how attentive we should be to those feelings. Obviously, there may be some differences. But I think the history is important to understand the attitude of the Panamanian people toward this continuing relationship over time, which continues to be important, because we are in a situation where we have a relationship and we have to deal with one another. The question is, can we work out a means of doing that, hopefully in a friendly and constructive way, or are we going to have a relationship which has hostility running through it?

Therefore, I think that the historical recitation which the Senator from Alaska made—which I think has been extremely interesting—is most helpful in developing the basis for the considering of these treaties.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague.

Mr. GARN. Will the Senator from Alaska yield to me to respond briefly?

Mr. GRAVEL. No. I just have 10 minutes left. I have a long statement. I will not complete it the way it is right now. I am in the middle of an economic argument.

Mr. GARN. Thirty seconds?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to.

Mr. GARN. I just simply say once again, neither of my distinguished colleagues reverted to the issues that will be debated on this treaty, again examples that refer to the economics of the situation. Whether it was a steal, or not, my statement stands on its own merits.

Mr. GRAVEL. I want to apologize to my colleague in not being generous with what little time I have left. We will have 30 days to really go after this. I would enjoy further colloquy with my colleague. I did not mean to be abrupt in the point he makes. He feels deeply about his side of the issue, as I do about mine.

I certainly have that appreciation.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, there has been much discussion on the floor today alleging that Panama's consent to the 1903 Treaty was not freely given, but, in fact, represented capitulation to outside interests. I think that an impartial reading of history will demonstrate that not only the 1903 Treaty, but also the subsequent treaties and related agreements were in fact reasonable compromises, with give and take on both sides. Indeed, it was a situation involving mutual benefit for both sides, in which various alternatives had been tried and discarded as unworkable.

The 1903 Treaty cannot be viewed in isolation. In the United States, the Nicaraguan route had had strong proponents; negotiations had actually been started at one point. The negotiations with Colombia had resulted in a treaty that was stillborn, both because of the tremendous political opposition in the U.S. Senate—opposition that led to filibusters and a special session—and opposition in the Colombian Senate that led to failure to ratify.

On the Panamanian side, there was an enormous frustration with the actions of the Colombian Senate—not only in its failure to ratify, but in its refusal over the period of many years to treat Panama as an integral part of the nation. As a matter of fact, the confederation between Panama and Colombia had long been strained. There had been at least six revolutions against Colombian rule; and, during the debate in the Colombian Senate, the Panamanian representatives threatened that there would be a revolution if the Hay-Herran Treaty were not ratified.

Once the die has been cast, the political leadership of both nations were faced with the very real possibility of the defeat of the project—a defeat which would have meant a political disaster on one side, and crushing repression by Colombia on the other. Thus the draft of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was based upon the Hay-Herran Treaty, with the addition of the amendments which had been proposed in the U.S. Senate and which had almost led to its defeat in the United States. Neither side could take the chance that the treaty would be defeated in the U.S. Senate. The concessions by Panama were not made out of unwilling weakness, but out of a very healthy desire to induce the United States to come to its aid.

Nor were the concessions all on one side. The United States made many important concessions which went against the grain of the U.S. Senate and the American people. The most important of these was the guarantee of Panama's independence—a guarantee that the military forces of the United States would be used to protect a far-away country, a guarantee that was no more popular in its day than it would be today.

We, however, kept to our promises. Our relations with Panama have had an honorable record, demonstrating mutual benefit to both nations and to the whole world. Far from taking advantage of a small and helpless nation, the United States has protected it in its infancy, assisted in its growth, contributed to its stability, and made its independence possible. The record shows clearly that we have made every effort to make adjustments in our relations with Panama, and we have been exceedingly generous in our concessions. There are occasions, I believe, when we have been too generous. Be that as it may, I fail to see how anybody could complain that we are arbitrarily imposing our will upon a reluctant neighbor.

Our relations with Panama, as I said, have been characterized by give and take. Moreover, the record shows that we have given to Panama far more than we have ever received in return. In the nature of things, considering the capabilities and needs of the two nations, this relationship has been one that is entirely correct. Generally speaking, we have freely given Panama various public works and projects worth many millions of dollars. We have relinquished many of the legal rights to activities which we have conducted in the territory of Panama. We gave to Panama concessions of property and the right to use property within our own territory of the Canal Zone. Furthermore, the annuity that was paid—an annuity that was derived from payments for the concessions of the Panama Railroad, not from "rent" for land—has been raised several times to adjust for the devaluation of the dollar.

In short, I would say that our concessions to Panama have been characterized by an increasing withdrawal from activities within Panama, and an increasing penetration of Panamanian activities within the Canal Zone. I recognize that the relationship of the Canal Zone to Panama is unique. It is inevitable that the proper operation and security of the canal will require some interchange between the two. Nevertheless, our sovereignty in the Canal Zone should not be negotiable. Other concessions may prove necessary or desirable, but the surrender of our sovereign rights is so radical as to make impossible any effective mechanism for guaranteeing the safe and continued operation of the Canal.

Mr. President, every Member of this body should become familiar with the generous concessions which the United States has made freely to the Republic of Panama, even before the negotiations for these present treaties began in earnest. Let us not demean ourselves, or beat our breasts in guilt. Our record will stand impartial examination.

Accordingly I would like to present to the Senate a list of the major U.S. concessions to Panama up to but not including the present treaties. These concessions are so numerous and so great that they are presented in chronological order. A brief of each concession stands next to the document and to the appropriate citation in the Canal Zone Code. I note that this is not a comprehensive list; a comprehensive list would include diplomatic and reciprocal arrangements, and technical matters such as control of radio frequencies and air traffic control. It would be so long that it would obscure the main point.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this compilation be printed in the Record at the conclusion of my remarks as exhibit 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See exhibit 1.]

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I also have a list of Panamanian concessions to the United States. I have construed the concept of "concessions" as widely as possible to give Panama the benefit of the doubt. For the most part, these are items of little significance. The major concession was the Defense Agreement of 1942. In that agreement, for example, besides the Rio Hato base, which has since been given back, Panamas concessions included such items as the following: Panama agreed to ask the United States cooperation in maintaining roads in the Republic which were used for common defense. In the 1955 Treaty, Panama gave up certain rights to free transportation on the Panama Railroad, a cause written in anticipation that the railroad would be given to Panama. Only intervention by Congress prevented the United States from losing the railroad at that time.

Because of the nature of the Panamanian concessions, they are more scattered than the U.S. concessions, and chronological order is of less significance. I have therefore summarized them by topics.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Panamanian concessions be printed as exhibit 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CITATION FROM CANAL ZONE CODE

Art XI, sec. 72: The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

Art XIV, sec. 75: As the price or compensation for the rights, powers and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

Art. XIX, sec. 80: The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the Canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war and supplies.

5. The United States promised to compensate for any damages that might be caused to property owners during the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the canal.

Art. VI, sec. 67: * * * all damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint Commission * * * whose decisions as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States * * *

6. It was agreed that after 50 years, the system of sewers and waterworks constructed and maintained by the United States would become the property of the cities of Panama and Colon.

Art. VII, sec. 68: All such works of sanitation, collection and disposition of sewage and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents or nominees shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for this payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of fifty years and upon the expiration of said term of fifty years the system of sewers and waterworks shall revert to and become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon * * * Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama—signed in Washington, March 2, 1936 (Hull-Allaro Treaty).

1. The United States renounced its right to guarantee the independence of Panama.

2. The right to expropriate without restriction additional land for Canal use was nullified. Henceforth, in the event of any unforeseen contingency, the 2 governments would attempt to agree upon such measures as necessary for the efficient operation of the Canal.

Art. I, sec. 32: Article I of the Convention of November 18, 1903, is hereby superseded.

Art. II, sec. 33: * * * under Article II of the Convention of November 18, 1903, by which it granted in perpetuity to the United States the use, occupation and control of the zone of land and land under water as described in the said Article, of the islands within the limits of said zone, of the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Elamerco, and of any other lands and waters outside of said zone, necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection of the Panama Canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works * * * the United States of America renounces the grant made to it in perpetuity by the Republic of Panama of the use, occupation and control of lands and waters, in addition to those now under the jurisdiction of the United States of America outside of the zone described in Article II of the aforesaid Convention * * *.

While both Governments agree that the requirement of further lands and waters for the enlargement of the existing facilities of the canal appears to be improbable, they nevertheless recognize * * * in the event of some now unforeseen contingency, the utilization of land or waters additional to those already employed should be in fact necessary for the maintenance, sanitation or efficient operation of the canal * * * the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama will agree upon such measures as it may be necessary to take in order to insure the * * * efficient operation and effective protection of the canal, in which the two countries are jointly and vitally interested.

Art. VI sec. 37: The first sentence of Art. VII of the Convention of November 18, 1903, is hereby amended so as to omit the following phrase: "or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain."

3. The United States gave up its right of "eminent domain" in the cities of Panama and Colon.

4. The United States' unlimited right to defend the canal was renounced. In the event that the security of Panama became threatened, the 2 governments would consult each other.

5. The annuity was increased from $250,000 gold to $430,000 in standing currency.

6. American authority over sanitation activities in the cities of Panama and Colon was transferred to the Republic of Panama.

7. Persons not connected with the operation or administration of the canal were barred from renting dwellings in the Canal Zone belonging to the U.S. Government and forbidden to reside in the zone.

Art. X sec.—: In case of an international conflagration or the existence of any threat of aggression which would endanger the security of the Republic of Panama or the neutrality or security of the Panama Canal, the Government of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama will take such measures of prevention and defense as they may consider necessary for the protection of their common interests. Any measures, in safeguarding such interests, which it shall appear essential to one Government to take, and which may affect the territory under the jurisdiction of the other Government, will be the subject of consultation between the two governments.

Art. VII sec. 38: Beginning with the annuity payable in 1934, the payments under Article XIV of the Convention of November 18, 1903, between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, shall be four hundred and thirty thousand Balboas (B/430,000.00) as defined by the agreement embodied in an exchange of notes of this date * * *.

Art. VI sec. 37: The third paragraph of art. VII of the Convention of November 18, 1903, is hereby abrogated.

Art. III sec. 34: (2) No person who is not comprised within the following classes shall be entitled to reside within the Canal Zone.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Steve Ward of Senator Bentsen's staff be granted privilege of the floor during consideration of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, we have now commenced the opening debate on the crucial treaty with Panama. I have often said over the last 15 years that I think some kind of a treaty could be negotiated that I could accept, but I have to admit that the longer I hear about this one from experts, the longer I read about it, the more dangerous it becomes. I am greatly impressed, for example, with the ability of the Panama Canal Company to run the finances of that Company and not have to come to the Congress for funds.

The finances of this whole treaty has become intriguing to me because I have mentioned before that I think our large banks and international banks have a lot more to do with this treaty than meets the eye, and I have made a rather detailed study of the history of the financial record of Panama over the last 8 years. I offer for the perusal of my colleagues, a breakdown of the moneys that have been borrowed by Panama and the results. I think we can safely say that Panama is bankrupt, and I think we can also safely say that beginning with the year 1969 Panama got into more and more trouble, and this alone causes me to have great question as to whether or not the Government of Panama will be able to run the canal company in the same excellent way that it has been run for 70 years. I doubt it. At the end of the study you will see the sources of my information and, in the future, and I hope in the not too distant future, I will make additional comments along these same lines.

It has been interesting to me to read the membership of the Trilateral Commission which I placed in the Record January 19, 1977, and realize that almost every member of the Carter administration, including the negotiators, members of our Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and other people close to our Government, are members of this organization. I believe that this is the reason we are getting all the pressure to push this treaty through, even though we do not have any legislation handed to us yet from the State Department, and it was supposed to be ready in early October; even though we have not completed hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee; and even though we have not been told an honest story about how much this treaty is going to cost the American people.

For example, we are told it will not cost one red cent to the American taxpayer.

I strongly dispute this and while we have no one person nor even a source, at this time, who can guess at the ultimate expense to the American taxpayer, I am willing to put my neck out and say it is going to cost over a billion dollars. My feelings about the uncertainty of this whole treaty, particularly as it relates to finances, is that within 5 years after we hand the canal over to the country of Panama, we will be back running it and financing it ourselves. I will have more to say on this at a later date. I ask unanimous consent that the paper I referred to earlier be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, 75 years ago the United States began a relationship with Panama that enabled us to build the Panama Canal and develop it into one of the world's great waterways, an economic boon in peacetime and a vital defense link in wartime.

Now the U.S. Senate is in the midst of a historic debate on the Panama Canal Treaties, treaties designed to modernize that relationship, to build a partnership that will meet the needs and protect the interests of the United States in the next 75 years. I am ready to vote in favor of ratification of these two treaties. They represent the collective negotiating effort of four administrations and reflect a wise and just accommodation of the interests of the United States and Panama. President Carter and his associates deserve admiration for the skill and perseverance they have shown in reducing long-agreed general principles to the treaty texts we are considering today.

The distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader have earned the thanks and respect of their colleagues for the way they have promoted consensus on this significant, but contentious, issue. I have joined with them, as well as the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Sparkman, the distinguished ranking minority member, Senator Case, and many others in sponsoring amendments to articles IV and VI of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal. These amendments incorporate language from the Carter-Torrijos statement of last October regarding the right of the United States to defend the neutrality of the Panama Canal after the year 2000 and the right of the U.S. vessels to expeditious passage through the canal, including going to the head of the line in emergencies. These amendments are sound ones, making explicit in the text of the treaty what I believe was already implicit.

Of the two treaties we are considering, the Panama Canal Treaty governs the operation of the canal until the year 2000. The other treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, insures the permanent neutrality of the canal after that date. The treaties grant the United States the primary right to protect and defend the canal until 2000, insure access by the United States and other nations, and guarantee its neutrality indefinitely after 2000.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has completed extensive hearings on the treaties in which the whole range of opinion, pro and con, was thoroughly explored. In its current debate the Senate is examining in the most minute detail the text of these treaties and their implications for the economy and defense of the United States.

Our chief concern should be the protection of long-term American interests in the canal—specifically its continued efficient operation and our access to it on a nondiscriminatory basis. The problem facing the United States is to insure our continuing military and commercial interests by putting relations with Panama on a realistic footing instead of trying to defend an indefensible status quo. Even most critics of the present treaties accept the fact that continuation of the status quo does not represent a practical alternative.

This subject has inflamed feelings and produced misunderstanding, although I have noticed from my mail that there is an increasing awareness of the long-term benefits these treaties will bring to the United States. We should keep in mind that, while protecting our own basic interests, we have to take into account the legitimate interest of the Panamanians in regaining control over their own land. Failure to reach a reasonable agreement with the Panamanians on this issue would diminish American influence, especially in Latin America, and could result in serious threats to the secure operation of the canal itself.

Far from forfeiting all control over the canal, the purpose of the Carter administration, like that of the Ford, Nixon, and Johnson administrations before it, has been to preserve the essential U.S. interests in the use and protection of the canal, to assure our right of access, and, finally, to assure the canal's neutrality indefinitely.

The questions that have been raised about the right of the United States to take military action, if necessary, to preserve the neutrality of the canal, and to enjoy expeditious passage of its warships through the canal have been dealt with satisfactorily by the assurances and clarifications provided by the administration and the Government of Panama. These assurances and clarifications are now incorporated in the amendments to the Neutrality Treaty I spoke of earlier.

Another matter of potential importance to the United States is the possibility of building a sea-level canal in Central America. The provision of the Panama Canal Treaty which prevents the United States from building an interoceanic canal in any other country in the region without Panamanian approval initially raised a question in my mind. I found, however, after investigating this that our studies indicate that the best route for another and more adequate canal is in Panama. The overall effect of this provision is to protect an important potential interest of the United States by preventing Panama from negotiating with another country for a new canal without our consent.

We are all dedicated to finding a workable and honorable arrangement that meets our needs and the valid aspirations of the Panamanians, one that looks ahead rather than is transfixed by a romantic vision of a noble but distant past. These treaties do that; I support them for that reason.

Mr. DeConcini (for himself and Mr. Ford) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them jointly to Ex. N, 95-1, the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

Mr. DeCONCINI. Mr. President, a good deal of the discussion involving the Panama Canal treaties has centered upon threats to the canal which might come from third parties—more specifically—Communist countries. While this concern is certainly justified, I have been equally bothered by the possibility that internal Panamanian activities might also be a threat to the waterway, should we give it up. Labor unrest and strikes; the actions of an unfriendly government; political riots or upheavals—each of these alone or in combination might cause a closure of the canal. In February 1975, for example, there was a “sickout” which disrupted the efficient operation of the canal. Yet as I read the treaties, there does not appear to be any specific guarantee that a disruption of the canal arising out of internal Panamanian activities can be swiftly and adequately dealt with.

Although General Torrijos has brought a welcome degree of stability to Panama in recent years, it can be argued that the history of Panama is one of substantial political instability and turmoil. Under normal circumstances, the United States would not or should not contemplate intervening in the internal affairs of another nation. However, there are extremely unique and special circumstances surrounding the relationship between the United States and Panama. Since the beginning of this century, the United States has exercised de facto sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone, and has been responsible for the defense and operation of the canal. We have maintained this control over the canal for one very simple reason: the Panama Canal is vital to the security, economic and military, of the United States. This fact must be recognized in any treaty which contemplates a fundamental change in the American-Panamanian relationship.

The amendment being offered by Senator Ford and myself is designed to clarify and expand the language of the neutrality treaty even beyond the amendments offered by the leadership. It is still unclear from the treaty language or the clarifying amendments whether the United States possessed the right to intervene to maintain the operation of the canal in circumstances when the closure of the canal is the result of an action other than external aggression. Our amendment makes it perfectly clear that the United States has the right to insure that the canal continues to operate regardless of the cause of its closure.

We neither believe nor expect that this language gives to the United States an indiscriminate right to meddle in the affairs of Panama. It does, however, take the view that the continued operation of the canal for the benefit of all nations is of paramount importance. Thus, the language of our amendment states that—

If the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America shall have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

We contemplate that if the Senate chooses to adopt this amendment that the American Government will act with restraint and with discretion. Without this amendment, however, the United States is essentially powerless under the terms of the treaty to insure free passage through this vital waterway.

I commend the amendment to our colleagues, and I hope they will regard it with favor during the deliberations of the next few weeks. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendment be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 31

At the end of article V add the following: "Notwithstanding the provisions of the preceding sentence, if the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America shall have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be."

AMENDMENT NO. 32

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. DeConcini (for himself and Mr. Ford) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them jointly to Ex. N, 95-1, the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. DeCONCINI. Mr. President, on numerous occasions I have stated that there are a number of questions raised by the Panama Canal treaties which have not been satisfactorily answered. National security concerns which have rightly been given the most attention are now being addressed through the amendment process. Some of the flaws so apparent in the ambiguous language of the Neutrality Treaty are now the object of remedial action, although these corrective measures may still be insufficient.

But there are other issues that have emerged from the debate. Some of those involve the ultimate cost of the Panama Canal treaties to the American taxpayer. Testimony last week before the Armed Services Committee was particularly troublesome for it suggested that contrary to the repeated assertions of the administration, American citizens might be saddled with heretofore unsuspected and unjustifiable costs over the next 22 years, and beyond.

Let us consider for a moment the value of the asset we are giving to the Republic of Panama. A very conservative valuation for interest purposes places the value at $319 million. The total replacement value, however, is $8.5 billion. Panama will also receive anywhere from $50 to $70 million per year from a combination of increased tolls and annuity payments. Finally—although it is not a formal part of the treaty—Panama will receive loan guarantees and credit of up to $295 million. This is above and beyond the $331.5 million in economic foreign aid Panama has already received from the United States.

The information presented at the Armed Services hearings, particularly from Governor Parfitt, suggests that there may be some hidden costs about which we have not been informed. More importantly, he pointed out that the United States may be unwittingly accepting substantial further financial obligations.

I was particularly disturbed to discover that some Panamanian officials believe that the $10 million optional payment to Panama provided for in article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty which is supposed to come from surplus revenues, will actually accumulate so that on the date we are supposed to leave their country, we shall owe them a $220 million lump sum payment. I find this incredible. The administration assures us that this interpretation is incorrect. If so, surely they can support the clarifying amendment which I now offer. Simply put, the amendment adds language to article XIII to the effect that the United States is not committed to any lump sum payment to Panama at the expiration of the Panama Canal Treaty. I do not believe that the American people are in a mood to pay more millions of their tax dollars for the privilege of giving up the canal. I hope my colleagues agree that we need to guard against this eventuality.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have the text of the amendment printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 32

At the end of paragraph 4(c) of article XIII, add the following: "Nothing in this subparagraph may be construed to commit the United States of America to make any payment to the Republic of Panama after the date of the termination of this Treaty."

[From the Congressional Record—Senate, Feb. 10, 1978]

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 10:30 having arrived, the Senate will now resume consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, which the clerk will report. Debate thereon is not to extend beyond 5 p.m. today.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, First Session, Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on yesterday I spoke at some length in support of the treaties. I desisted from completing my speech yesterday in deference to other Senators who had been waiting. As a courtesy to the minority leader and other Senators who wanted to speak, I withheld the completion of my speech. At this time I shall continue on that speech, but I want first to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) who very patiently awaited yesterday a turn at which he could deliver his own remarks in connection with the treaties.

So, Mr. President, without yielding my rights to the floor at this time, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) for such comments as he wishes to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader very much for his generosity, and I promise him it will not be a lengthy speech.

Of course, it is on the Panama Canal Treaty, and I am in opposition to this Treaty. Even though most of my original opposition was based on the lack of proper language in my opinion to guarantee our right to defend the canal. I believe that the amendments that have been offered to allow us to have the right to intervene at any time will remove that objection, but it will not change my vote.

Mr. President, the other day we had hearings before the Armed Services Committee, and I only wish that those hearings could have been held before the Foreign Relations Committee. To me, our hearings only confirmed further that the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality of the Panama Canal should not be ratified. If these treaties had formally been before our committee, I doubt they would have been recommended to the Senate for approval. In fact, there is serious question that the treaties can even be made acceptable by amendment and I do not believe that they can. At the least, further negotiation is required.

Militarily, arrangements in the proposed treaties are contrary to what most military experts say is in our best national interest. If we insist upon giving the canal to Panama, we must then through further negotiation better assure the continued right of the United States to keep the canal operating. We seem to have lost sight of the point that the canal is far more important to us than to Panama.

Financially, the testimony on the canal turnover was even more disturbing. If the Panama Canal Treaty is ratified, we could be committing ourselves to pay Panama hundreds of millions of dollars over the life of the treaty, due to possible, and quite probable, deficit operations. In fact, the financial forecast made for the proposed Panama Canal Commission is so shaky that the present Governor of the Canal Zone said he would not buy stock in the Commission if it was available and if he was able. Too much risk and uncertainty.

In my judgment, based on the testimony before the committee, I believe that the Panama Canal Commission will operate at a deficit after 1984, and that is after tolls have been raised to the point where additional increases would only drive away users and not produce additional revenue. This means it is likely that the canal will operate with an annual deficit through the time we would turn the canal over to Panama in 1999. Since the Panama Canal Treaty requires the canal to be turned over free of liens and debts, Uncle Sam is going to have to pick up a substantial tab.

At the same time the canal is operating in the red. Panama, as prescribed in the Panama Canal Treaty, will receive about $70 million annually through payments from the Commission, or a minimum of $1.5 billion cumulatively by 2000.

There is also the matter of the $20 million annual interest payment, required by law, paid the United States by the Panama Canal Company on the U.S. net direct investment. The State Department witness before our committee stated that the implementing legislation would contain a provision that the U.S. Treasury forego this payment.

And, Mr. President, I might say that we have yet to see this legislation. It was promised in October. We have been waiting since the hearings closed this week to hear from the State Department if anything has been done about it. Frankly, I do not know how we can proceed much further without the implementing legislation coming over from the State Department.

Over the life of the treaty these payments I am talking about mean the loss of over $400 million to the Treasury, another significant cost to the American people.

These kinds of financial arrangements just do not make sense and the American people should not be asked to support them.

The other evening at the end of the President's fireside chat. I was called by the press and asked what I thought about it and in simple English I said:

I wish he would level with the American people and tell the American people the truth if he can about the amount of money that it is going to cost the taxpayers of this country.

The President, as I say, was misinformed when he says this turnover will not cost the American people.

For that to be correct, we will need to reopen negotiations on these financial points. There is no requirement to pay Panama huge sums to take a canal that is worth $9.8 billion. That is quite a bit more than we have been hearing about, but I have added up all the available figures and it comes to $9.8 billion that this country is going to turn over to Panama.

Finally, the Senate requires the implementing legislation before it will have all the data necessary to determine what the full impact of the treaties will be. This legislation, as I said, was promised last October, but it is still not here.

To ratify these treaties without knowing the details of this particular legislation is like signing a contract without reading the fine print. I suggest this legislation is deliberately being delayed because disclosure of its contents would further jeopardize support for the treaties.

In summary, Mr. President, the military and financial conditions of the treaties are unsatisfactory and to the disadvantage of the United States. The administration continues to push for their ratification but apparently will not give Congress the necessary implementing legislation.

Mr. President, there has been quite a bit said about the probable cost to the American people, and there has been quite a bit of conjecture of what these large sums of money will be used for.

I have to say, in my opinion, Panama is a bankrupt country, and I honestly do not believe that the payments earned by the operation of the canal will ever correct the economic chaos that exists in that country.

For example, they have total loans from 1969 to 1976 of $489 million obtained from the World Bank, the International Finance Corporation, the Inter-American Development Bank, Eximbank, and AID. And then from that relatively small amount, the loans from 1969 to 1976 were $131.7 million. So total loans from this agency from 1960 to 1968 were $10 million and then they jumped to $131 million.

We have the question of private banks and the money that is owed by the Republic of Panama. Private bank loans in our country and abroad have totaled today $886.6 million.

I have often in my debate suggested that maybe this treaty was written by the trilateral commission because the trilateral commission is headed by bankers, not just our own bankers but international bankers around this world.

I find it rather unusual that we have increased our foreign aid to the so-called developing nations, mostly of Africa, where these financial institutions have loaned money to these countries—and they are not getting the interest paid back—that we have increased our foreign aid to these countries. Again why? And I hope some day that answer will be coming.

The total loans from private banks now is $886.6 million, and the total loans from all sources is $1.5 billion.

The deficit of the Government has run from $8 million in 1968 to a high of $195.2 million in 1974, and in 1977 it was $77.4 million.

I ask unanimous consent that this compilation of debts be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will say, for those who are interested in where these figures came from that I have listed on this paper, it is chiefly from "External Financing of Latin American Countries," published in October 1977 by the Division of General Studies of the Economic and Social Development Department of the Inter-American Development Bank.

Mr. President, returning to the value of the canal, which we have never been able to get down in black and white from the Panama Canal Company itself, I have obtained miscellaneous values of the canal.

The original cost of building the canal was $387 million, and the original cost value of the Panama Canal enterprise was $993.1 million. That includes $10 million paid to Panama under the 1903 treaty.

The book value of the Panama Canal Company is $551.8 million, and the Canal Zone government, $59.6 million, for a total of $561.4 million; but the replacement value of canal operations, including armed forces facilities, totals $9.8 billion, including property at $3.5 billion, the Panama Canal itself at $5 billion, and the military, naval, and air plant at $1.2 billion.

So, Mr. President, when we hear from our President that this is not going to cost the taxpayers of this country anything, that is just plain wrong, and I would hope in his next fireside chat the President will carefully review what he said in his last fireside chat, and give the American people as honest an appraisal as we can get. I think "appraisal" is the only word we can use, because we feel rather certain that up until the year 1984 the Panama Canal Company will operate either at a profit or a slight loss, but after 1984 it is pretty much anybody's guess. In my estimation, the loss could reach, by the year 2000, or 1999, over a billion dollars, this would have to come out of the taxpayers' pockets.

At the same time, I repeat, I do not honestly believe that the Government of Panama as now constituted will be able to help themselves, help their people, with the money that comes from the canal. We find today that every cent that comes out of the canal operation goes back into the maintenance of that canal. People do not realize that we have dug enough dirt out of the canal since it has been finished to make a hole 1,600 feet square through the entire Earth. That is a lot of dirt to be dug out of anyplace, and it cost a lot of money. Our people are there dredging 24 hours a day.

I question, as I have questioned publicly before, that when the Panamanians begin to see these large sums of money come across their desks daily, weekly, and monthly, they are going to be able to resist the temptation to use that money for other purposes than maintenance of the canal. It is my feeling, therefore, that even if we do approve this treaty, within 5 years after the canal has been turned over the canal will be closed, or the United States will be back running it the way we are running it today.

I hope during the course of the debate we can spend more time on the cost element. I was particularly impressed by the minority views put in the report by the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), because he covered quite thoroughly the financing of the canal operations, starting on page 194. I would advise my colleagues to read that and any other information they can obtain in this particular area.

Mr. President, this is my opening speech on the treaties. I wanted to make this speech before the Lincoln Day period started, because we Republicans will be out extolling the virtues of Abraham Lincoln and the poverty of the Republican Party. Hopefully we will come out with as bright a shine on the nose as Mr. Lincoln has in his place in Illinois.

Mr. President, the U.S. operational control of the canal and the attendant U.S. military presence in Panama to assure the continuation of that control have become, to me, the foundation of the security of both the United States and the Western Hemisphere against a Communist takeover of Latin America. Now this is true from the military as well as in a political and psychological standpoint. Panama, because of its geographical location at the crossroads of the Atlantic-Pacific transportation, because of its dominant position in relation to the Caribbean, and because of the existence of the canal, is at once both symbolically and practically the key to hemispheric defense. It is also the Achilles heel of that defense. The continuation of the U.S. military presence in Panama is, therefore, to me, the all important factor. As long as we have an adequate force in Panama to hold the fort until reinforcements, if needed, can be sent in, there seems to be little likelihood that defense of the canal will ever become necessary.

It is almost inconceivable that in the face of that military presence, any nation, unless it were bent on precipitating World War III, would launch a significant effort to wrest control of the canal from the United States. Defense from within, let me remind you, is a far different thing than defense from without. It is the latter that the new treaties would require the United States and the Western Hemisphere to rely on. Now from a military standpoint, in the absence of a preliminary holding capability, any attacking or infiltrating forces would become speedily entrenched in all strategic locations and the task of dislodging them from without would be a major costly and highly destructive one as compared with that of repelling such forces at the outset. And from a political standpoint, there is also a vast difference between, on the one hand, augmenting military forces already legitimately positioned within a country and, on the other, introducing forces into a country where there are none, no matter how firm the legal right to do so may be. The latter would be the case after 1999, and again, in my opinion, before that, under the proposed new treaties.

Even if it were quite clear that the United States had the right to send force into Panama to defend the canal, and the proposed new treaties are wholly unclear on this point, and I might say I've read both the treaties in Spanish and, of course, in English—the cries of imperialist aggression and imperialist intervention would be so orchestrated internationally as to effectively deter any such action on the part of the United States, woefully sensitive as we Americans seem to be to world opinion. Even then rightful defense of lives and property are involved. Not much less important in the military considerations regarding a continuing U.S. military presence in Panama are the psychological ones.

SOUTHCOT—that is the Southern Command—has become to most Latin American military leaders and, therefore, to most Latin American governments, the energizing center of their Latin American defense system. They feel possessive about it—they are proud of it. This has come about by virtue of SOUTHCOT's military assistance and representative functions throughout Latin America, all headquartered in Latin America. The very fact that the United States deems Latin America of such strategic importance as to maintain the hub of its operations in defense of the area in Panama is a matter of considerable significance to Latin American leaders. That significance is appreciably enhanced by the additional fact that the Commander of SOUTHCOT has consistently been a U.S. general officer of a rank substantially higher than the size of the forces under his command would ordinarily call for.

If the functions and responsibilities of SOUTHCOT were to be transferred to a command headquarters within the continental United States, as the proposed new treaties would, in effect, require, U.S. military rapport with Latin America and, hence, U.S. diplomatic rapport with Latin American governments, would diminish greatly.

A tendency would inevitably be generated for Latin American nations to look elsewhere for military assistance and cooperation. The basic nexus of current United States-Latin American relations would be destroyed. The recognition of this fact is, of course, anathema to those who view foreign relations only in terms of universal sweetness and light. Nevertheless, it is a reality and a transcendent one.

One of the major contributing factors to the development of this situation—the close military bonds between the United States and the Latin American nations, has been the various military schools operated by SOUTHCOT in Panama for the benefit of all Latin American military establishments. Many of these schools are staffed to a substantial degree by their own Latin American honor graduates.

The alumni body of these institutions spread throughout Latin America now numbers around fifty thousand, and while I do not think any North American has any liking for dictators, as long as we have to live occasionally with dictators, I would rather have them be friends of ourselves than against us. To cite just one example of the effectiveness of these military educational facilities, the counterinsurgency curriculum conducted over the years in one of the schools, the prestigious School of the Americas, has played a leading role in thwarting the Latin American communist insurgency problem instituted by Fidel Castro as far back as the 1960's.

Now to give all this up—to place ourselves in a position of being unable to resist a takeover of the Panama Canal by the Soviets or by any other country dominated by what I call "slave" governments, to place Panama in the position of a sitting duck and to destroy our close military and hence governmental ties with Latin America, to me, would be the height of national folly.

The proposed new treaties are a blueprint for just such a course of action. And, in closing, I might say that I have talked with President Carter about this and I have written him the same suggestion I made to his face—namely, with all due respect to the work done by Mr. Bunker and Mr. Linowitz, and others, that we begin negotiations again and keep the Panama Canal up on the shelf and work out some kind of a Marshal plan or something that we can do in that way to help the Panamanian people, thereby taking care of the great inequities that we, ourselves, by the establishment of the Canal Zone, are mostly responsible for.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) for the purpose of his being able to yield to Senator Griffin.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the distinguished majority leader. I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his reference to my minority views, and perhaps to add a footnote or a little addendum to some of the things that he has said concerning the matter of bank loans having been made to the Panamanian Government.

It use to be said, or was said at one time, that what is good for General Motors is not necessarily good for the United States; and even though I am from Michigan I think that is true. I do not think that the interests of General Motors necessarily are always the same as the interests of the United States.

By the same token, the interests of the big New York banks, which have made huge loans to the Government of Panama under the Torrijos regime, are not necessarily the same as the views or the policies that the United States should follow.

I called attention to the fact—I regret it that I had to do it, but I really felt that it should be done, because there was an affront to the Senate involved—when President Carter circumvented the confirmation process in submitting the name, as chief negotiator, of Mr. Sol Linowitz by putting him up only on a temporary basis, and not having his qualifications and possible conflicts of interest subjected to scrutiny.

I thought it was too bad that Mr. Linowitz did not come forward with the information and in fact want a hearing, to reveal the fact that he had been on the board of directors of one of these big New York banks that participated in the huge loans made to the Torrijos government in Panama, and furthermore, to have acknowledged and given his explanation, which I feel confident would have been adequate, about the allegations that earlier, as a lawyer, he had represented the Marxist Allende government of Chile, and the allegation that his law firm and he had to register as an agent of the foreign government in connection with that activity. To have these things surface later and to have the administration put his name up on a temporary 6-month basis puts him under a time deadline, so that he has got to get the treaty negotiated before his 6-month period is up, does not exactly build confidence in the Senate as far as the process is concerned, and I think the Senate ought to resent having been treated that way.

Under the Constitution, the Senate is an integral part of the treaty-making process, and a chief negotiator who is going to negotiate a treaty should have had his name submitted to the Senate, and we should confirm him. I think not only that, but it would have been wise if the administration had taken the Senate into its confidence more, not only this administration but prior administrations, in terms of what was going on in the negotiations. Certainly as we were nearing the final product the Senate should have been a part of it.

This has happened in the negotiation of many treaties in the past.

Those observations do not go precisely to the text of the treaty, but when we see so many ambiguities in language and we see measures which were adopted at the last minute that, in my humble opinion, do not serve the interests of the United States, then we look at the background and say, "Well, how did this come about?"

That aspect of it, the fact that there are these big loans outstanding to the Torrijos government of Panama, and the circumstances under which Mr. Linowitz' nomination was made, just do not help anybody who is on the fence in trying to decide which way to go.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree with my friend from Michigan. In fact, I was inclined toward voting for the ratification of these treaties. We had a meeting over here one afternoon in the majority leader's office in which Mr. Bunker and Mr. Linowitz were in attendance. I told them my turn was not 180° but maybe 120°; that I could not go much further until I saw the text of the treaties. He told me I would see them within the next day. It was 2 days after the President and Torrijos had the ceremony that I saw copies of the treaties.

Since that time I have debated Mr. Linowitz in Atlanta before the Georgia Bar. I made the proper apologies for just having to assume the presence of the trilateral commission, because I recognized that he was a member of this. In fact, I would not say I could safely say but nearly every member of the Carter administration is a member of this. I put their purposes into the Record sometimes ago. I believe I will put them in again.

They are very loyal men. They are patriotic, good Americans. But I do not quite agree with all of their purposes. One of those purposes is sort of making the world over, not in the nature of the United States but in the nature of what they feel it should be. In this making over is the making over of the monetary system of the world. We have heard Mr. Robert McNamara speak on that subject many times.

I would like to know sometime, and I would hope that during the course of this debate we could get into this matter, why these big banks in this country and abroad are so vitally interested in the canal treaty. The only conclusion I can come to is that they are in trouble, and they are in trouble because they have made stupid loans to countries which are not paying them back.

I agree with my friend from Michigan that it is not the job of the U.S. Government to pay people who have lost money. That is the way of doing business in this country: You either succeed or you do not. It is not our purpose to bail out banks, railroads, airlines, or anybody else.

Again, I am happy that the Senator wrote what he did in his minority views. I hope that the people of the United States will slowly come to realize that giving the Panama Canal away is not just giving away something we have paid for throughout the 70 years, but we are going to keep on paying for it, and paying for it to the benefit of some other country.

Mr. President, again I want to thank the distinguished majority leader for his generosity in yielding time to me. I yield back the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) for his patience of yesterday and his forbearance in waiting, as he did, in presenting his remarks. He has certainly waited long and patiently. I was glad to yield to him before proceeding with my comments today.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) has referred to the expiration of the term of Ambassador Linowitz in a way that would imply that simply because the 6-month term of Mr. Linowitz as Ambassador was coming to an end, the treaties somehow had to be hurried, and the completion of the negotiations was hastily made, leaving the inference for some to draw, perhaps, because Mr. Linowitz' term was about to come to an end that, ipso facto, the negotiations were summarily and prematurely brought to a close.

Well, Mr. Griffin asked Mr. Linowitz some questions during the Foreign Relations Committee hearings. But as far as I have been able to determine in a cursory reading of the hearings, I cannot see that Mr. Griffin made much of a point of that matter during his questioning of Mr. Linowitz.

The truth of the matter is that Mr. Linowitz did not have to have the title of Ambassador to continue to assist Mr. Bunker in the negotiations. He continues to assist even up to today in the efforts to bring about the proper understanding of the contents of the treaty.

Let it not be said that Mr. Linowitz had to retain that title of Ambassador in order to continue to assist Ambassador Bunker in the negotiations.

Mr. President, I spoke on yesterday at some length, and I responded to questions from other Senators. I indicated then that I had not completed my speech, but that out of deference and as a courtesy to other Senators, particularly the minority leader, I would forgo the completion of my remarks until another day, perhaps today.

I shall not detain the Senate overly long today because I expect to be discussing the treaties further following the nonlegislative-day period.

The matter of economics, for example, is going to be addressed at considerable length and in appropriate depth by me and by others at the proper time.

Mr. President, the core of American concern over the Panama Canal treaties extends beyond the technical arguments of sovereignty and defense and use of the canal.

These are important, vital arguments and issues, but the fundamental concern of the American people, I believe, goes deeper than even these fundamental technical arguments.

I believe that a fundamental uneasiness felt by the American people is that in approving the new treaties, we are in some way retreating from the spirit, or the fervor, or the esprit de corps that made this country great.

There are those who would say that we are sliding down the mountain of greatness; that we have reached the zenith, that we have reached the apex of our national greatness, and that we are receding from that zenith of power; that the Vietnam war, and now the possibility of what some of the opponents refer to as "giving up" the Panama Canal, are signs that our nationalistic fiber is being peeled away; that we are soft—soft.

Such an argument is not worthy of a great people. Such an argument is not worthy of the American people, and it is not worthy of our maturity as the leading world power.

We must not be so insecure as a great nation as to insist upon an anachronism, a colonial presence in Panama.

It is because we are a strong nation that we can act with vision, a vision that is in our country's best interests and that we can change with the times; that we not only can see the pebble in the road today, but that we can see the distant mountain on the horizon tomorrow. We must not let this historic Panama Canal debate become clouded with the politics of fear, the arguments of fear, the concept of fear—fear of loss of power, fear of loss of face. In approving the ratification of these treaties, we lose neither; there is neither loss of power nor loss of face.

We must remember that Panama is a sovereign nation. Its people have the same basic feelings, basic aspirations and nationalistic pride that we have. Let us walk in the shoes of the Panamanian people. But, more importantly, let us make sure that we are filling our own giant shoes.

We seek approval of these treaties not for Panamanian interests. Panamanian interests are a byproduct. We seek approval of these treaties for our own national security, our own commercial and political interests. And when all of the fancy trappings are stripped away, and when the historical arguments over the 1903 treaty to which we addressed our remarks yesterday and the subsequent intentions or misintentions are put aside, it remains that these treaties today promote our interests and will add immeasurably to the backbone of our foreign policy in Central and South America.

It would be a mistake for us to turn our backs on these treaties through some false sense of nationalistic bravado. The treaties must be judged with common sense, and with a clear perception of the realities of today and the realities of tomorrow, and with a simple sense of justice and fairness.

Mr. President, yesterday, as I have indicated, I spoke of the history of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1903 and our Nation's longstanding interest in a secure international waterway linking the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, open to the United States and all of the nations of the world. In the long, tenuous history of the canal, nothing has come easily. Certainly not the construction of the waterway, which, even in this space age, remains one of history's outstanding engineering achievements.

Nor was agreement on these two treaties which are now before us easily achieved. There is a tendency to overlook the fact that the negotiations which led to the treaties involved a two-sided process, attempting to reconcile the interests of both nations. It is my firm belief that the U.S. negotiators have secured an agreement which, as President Carter has stated, "is in the highest national interest of the United States and will strengthen our position in the world."

Mr. President, that is the mudsill, that is the benchmark, that is the cornerstone on which we should base our decision in this debate: what is in the best interests of the United States of America. Our primary objective is to have continued access to and continued use of the canal. Because of its importance to United States and world commerce and because of its strategic value, such use is best assured by ratification of the new treaties, which would result in an atmosphere of cooperation rather than confrontation in Panama.

Yesterday, Mr. President, when I alluded to cooperation versus confrontation, the question was asked of me by the very distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt)—and I paraphrase. Whether it was a question or an observation, it added up to the same: To wit, that it is to be hoped that we do not reach our decision on these treaties based on the fact that there may be confrontation somewhere down the road and based on the fact that there are extremists in Panama who might stir up trouble if the treaties are rejected.

I said at that time that there have always been extremists in Panama and in the United States of America and in every country. But I stated also that we were not—to use the words of some of the opponents—running, not bending the knee, not making a decision out of fear. And I stated that there is no conceivable situation which could arise, if the treaties were rejected, which the U.S. military could not handle.

By that, I meant that there is no conceivable situation the result of which would mean the ouster of U.S. forces. Of course, difficult situations could arise, there could be a very hostile environment that would necessitate additional American manpower. Yes, in any conceivable situation, we could continue to hold onto the facilities. We could continue to control the Canal Zone. But there is no way under heaven that we could guarantee—no matter how many American soldiers and marines and airmen and naval personnel that we should send to Panama—no way that we could guarantee the continued, uninterrupted use of the canal at any and all times by our own country, or the other countries of the world.

Of course, we could convoy ships through the canal as they were convoyed across the Atlantic during World War II, but we could not assure uninterrupted use of that canal at all times.

That was what I meant.

But there is an easier way, a way to avoid that kind of circumstance, a way to avoid the confrontation, a way to avoid the hostile environment that would bring about certain interruptions of use of the canal and have a detrimental impact upon world shipping through that international waterway.

There is a better way, and that better way is to work in the context of the good neighbor policy, to work with, rather than in opposition to, the country that is sovereign over that strip of land, 10 miles wide and 50 miles long.

What is desirable and necessary is an atmosphere of good will and understanding and mutual respect and faith and trust. That is the way best to keep the canal open, to best guarantee access to it, and best to assure the unimpeded and uninterrupted use of it by our country and the other countries of the world in peace and in war.

The President in his recent fireside chat said, and I quote:

Military experts agree that even with the Panamanian armed forces joined with us as brothers against a common enemy, it would take a large number of American troops to ward off a heavy attack. I, as President, would not hesitate to deploy whatever armed forces are necessary to defend the canal and I have no doubt that even in a sustained combat that we would be successful. But there is a much better way than sending our sons and grandsons to fight in the jungles of Panama. We would serve our interests better by implementing the new treaties, an action that will help to avoid any attack on the Panama Canal.

That is the close of the quotation which I shall use from the President's fireside chat.

So let it not be said, Mr. President, that we would vote to approve the treaties because we have lost our nerve, that we are running, that we are retreating, that we are receding, that we are losing face.

We will be acting in the best interests of the United States to assure the continued use of that canal by our own country and other countries.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), who is a very fine, useful member—and may I say an eloquent one—of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the majority leader for yielding. I appreciate his kind remarks.

He goes to the very core of the argument over the treaties when he emphasizes that this is not a question of yielding. It is not a question of genuflecting before Omar Torrijos. It is not a question of being pushed around by one of the smallest and weakest countries in the Hemisphere.

Such arguments are absurd on their face. Neither, I suggest, is it a question of what radical elements might do.

Whether the Senate chooses to ratify or reject these treaties, as the distinguished majority leader has correctly observed, every nation on Earth has its radical elements and there is no way to guarantee, one way or the other, that these elements in Panama might not cause trouble in the future.

What we are discussing here is not the irresponsible action of radical elements. It is, rather, the legitimate aspirations of the Panamanian people, the whole people, to reclaim jurisdiction over their land.

A plebiscite has recently been held in Panama and two-thirds of the Panamanian people have endorsed these treaties as the way to reclaim their jurisdiction. That, in itself, demonstrates how strongly the great majority of Panamanian people feel.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And with a 95 percent turnout.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, indeed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Which ought to teach us a lesson in our own elections.

Mr. CHURCH. Moreover, I say to the Senator that many of those who cast their ballots against the treaties did so because they believed that the gains in the treaty for Panama were insufficient, that it was unfair to make them wait until the end of the century to assume the management of the canal, that the United States, in effect, had retained too much at the bargaining table.

If the question in the plebiscite had been confined to the right of Panama to reassert her jurisdiction over the Canal Zone, I dare say that the vote would have been very nearly unanimous.

So let us not get this debate diverted into a discussion of what radical elements may do. The real question, as the Senator has correctly put it, is whether the United States is going to recognize the legitimate aspirations of the Panamanian people. The Canal Zone is the only sizable piece of foreign real estate that we hold anywhere in the world today against the wishes of the people of the country in which that holding is located.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator has the floor, I have been the interrupter.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator allow me to intervene at this point?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, indeed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. How would the people of Idaho feel if, through the State of Idaho, there were a strip of land 10 miles wide and 50 miles in length, under the control and jurisdiction of a foreign power?

I ask this rhetorical question: How would the people of West Virginia feel—a State whose motto is "mountaineers are always free," always, always free—if, through those million hills there ran a strip of land 10 miles wide and 50 miles long or 5 miles long or a half-mile long, which was controlled by a foreign power? How would the mail then run?

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator knows full well the answer. The people of Idaho and the people of West Virginia would not put up with it for a minute.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There would not be a foot of territory along that strip in West Virginia that would be safe, at day or at night, for those of the foreign power. And that is the situation that the Panamanians have faced for over 70 years.

Mr. CHURCH. No American listening to this debate would have any doubt about what we would do.

The only reason the Panamanians have refrained from taking matters into their own hands for the last 75 years is the enormity of our power, the immensity of our military presence, as contrasted to their own weakness.

The opponents of these treaties have the argument turned on its head. It is not the United States that will be weak by being magnanimous. Just the reverse. It has been the weakness of Panama which has made it impossible for the people of that country to rectify an imposition which, if it existed in this country, our people would not condone for a moment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I will yield shortly.

On this point, I wish to quote for the record Secretary of Defense Brown during his appearance before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate, at the time he addressed his remarks to the subject of the Panama Canal Treaties. I quote Secretary of Defense Brown:

The canal was built for shipping, not slogans. We seek to guarantee transit of vessels, not theoretical claims of title. These goals we have sought, as I said at the beginning, are practical. The issues before you are practical ones. Our negotiations have obtained instruments which, more certainly than thousands of forces and their armaments on the spot, will assure those practical objectives for generations to come.

That is the close of the quotation which I shall use at this moment.

I now yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch).

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding to me.

I have had difficulty believing what I have been hearing here, making comparisons between West Virginia and other States and the situation in Panama.

I suggest and submit that if Congress does not do something for New York City very soon, New York City would be happy to have somebody like the United States come in and assist them, rather than go down the drain.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The United States has assisted New York City.

Mr. HATCH. The Banking Committee has refused to assist them this year.

All I am saying is that there are a lot of differences.

It does annoy me somewhat to hear the argument that we have mistreated and tramped all over Panama, when in fact we have given them, per capita, the highest foreign aid of any nation in the world, when we have done a great deal for Panama. I think we should do a great deal more—if we were permitted to continue to manage the canal in the same expeditious, inexpensive, and indiscriminate manner that we have in the past, for the benefit of all nations; especially if we did not have to give up that control, which may be very unbeneficial to this country, and especially under the terms submitted by the President and others, that it will never cost us a dime, when we all know that it will cost us hundreds of millions of dollars for the next 20 years.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not yield at that point.

Mr. HATCH. May I ask a question, then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The President, in referring to the revenues of the canal as being the total to Panama, said:

Under the new treaty, any payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal.

The President was preeminently correct in that statement, and it is a misplay on words to accuse the President of the United States of having said something that he did not say. Payments to Panama will come from the tolls that result from the traffic through the canal. We will talk more about the economics of the canal.

The distinguished Senator does not put words in my mouth. I have not said we "mistreated" the Panamanians. But I have said that the time has come, in the best interests of the United States, to approve these treaties and by the year 2000 to relinquish the control over the Canal Zone and the operations of that zone and that the sovereignty of Panama, which always has resided in Panama since the 1903 treaty was written, be fairly and justly recognized.

Mr. President, with inclusion of the two amendments I have proposed together with the distinguished minority leader and 77 other Senators, I am convinced that there can be no doubt that the treaties will better protect our long-term interests than does the 1903 treaty.

Since I first reviewed the treaties in September, it has been apparent to me that it would be necessary to clarify two important points concerning our interests and our rights, and these two amendments, if adopted, will guarantee our rights on these two matters.

First, the right of the United States to take action to defend the canal and to assure that it will remain open; and Second, expeditions or "head-of-the-line" passage through the canal for U.S. military vessels in time of need or emergency.

I stressed to President Carter the importance of clarifying these matters prior to the Panamanian plebiscite which occurred on October 23, and they were dealt with in the statement of understanding agreed to by President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14.

In November, when I led a Senate delegation to Panama, we discussed the statement of understanding with General Torrijos, and he unhesitatingly indicated his adherence to the agreement. Further, it was clear that the Panamanian people had been informed about these points prior to the plebiscite. In a television address to the citizens of Panama on October 20, General Torrijos discussed the statement and said he should have signed it. The transcript of that address is included in the published report of our senatorial delegation to the Republic of Panama. General Torrijos had the text of the understanding read to the audience. He said,

Let the people know that when they go to vote on October 23, everything will have been said. There is nothing, absolutely nothing, hidden.

I do not think there should be any question that we have the right to defend the canal or the right of expeditious passage under the treaties. But in order that no doubt about that interception be left for future generations, I have consistently taken the position that the substance of the October 14 statement should be incorporated in the treaties or into the resolution of ratification by some parliamentary technique, and that is the purpose of the amendments.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point just for an observation?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. I think it would be fair to say that without the distinguished majority leader's insistence that that be the procedure we would probably not be on the floor now with 77 or more cosponsors, or there will be more cosponsors. And I think the distinguished majority leader has performed a great service, as has the minority leader and the distinguished Senators on the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And as has the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) who now speaks, who from the beginning has insisted that these points be clarified.

Mr. DOLE. But the point is that the two amendments go a long way in satisfying the fears that many Americans have, and whether we are now in a position to be able to support the treaties, there is no doubt in my mind that we would not be on the floor today with the treaties had it not been for the leadership provided and we may still have some difference, but I think the American people understand, and should understand, that we have gone this far, and we have gotten this far for a number of reasons. First, the leadership provided by the distinguished majority leader and those on the Foreign Relations Committee and the distinguished minority leader, Senator Baker, the willingness of the leader of Panama to accept, maybe not with enthusiasm, but at least to understand the problem we had in the Senate, and I think the President of the United States understanding the problem we had in the U.S. Senate. There may still be differences that can or cannot be resolved, but I hope and I believe that the American people understand that these are two giant steps in the right direction. I commend the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas. He has rendered a contribution to the national debate and he has rendered a service to the people in pressing for action on these two points. He may have other points in mind. I do not know. There may be, and there will be others in the Senate who will have additional suggestions. And I think we should all keep an open mind to such suggestions as may come forth in the form of declarations and statements, and so on, keeping in mind, however, that we ought not go beyond a certain line, a line that is consistent with the best interests of the United States and one which will not require renegotiation of the treaties and hopefully will not require another plebiscite on the part of the Panamanians.

I want to turn now, and I shall not overly detain those of my colleagues who have not yet spoken—I will not complete my remarks today—but I do want to turn for a few minutes to some or at least one or two of the major points at issue in this debate. I shall not attempt to discuss all of these major points today. In some cases, I believe there has been a considerable amount of misinformation. There are several key points that should be kept in mind.

One of the basic reasons I support these treaties and one of their essential features is that whenever and however the neutrality of the canal is threatened we shall have the right to take whatever action necessary to protect that neutrality.

That right is established in article IV of the canal treaty and will be assured after the year 2000 by the permanent neutrality treaty reinforced by the amendment proposed by the joint leadership, amendment No. 20 to article IV.

And I shall read from this amendment, which is sponsored and cosponsored by 78 Senators, the following extract:

Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat.

Not just some threats, not just certain threats—but any threat; not just any threat emanating from a certain source, but any threat no matter from whence it may come.

"Any" is all-inclusive, all-encompassing, and all-embracing.

The Foreign Relations Committee, in its report on the Panama Canal Treaty, stated its interpretation of the understanding of this amendment which that committee recommended:

It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however—

Whenever and however—the canal is threatened.

Let me say it again:

It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however the canal is threatened. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, have the right to act against aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

So, Mr. President, let there be no doubt as to the meaning, as to the clear meaning, of those words.

I would also mention another feature of these treaties which is often overlooked, but which is an additional reason why the new treaties are an improvement over the 1903 treaties. Listen to this:

Under the existing 1903 treaty, it is conceivable that Panama could invite or allow another country or countries to garrison troops within its borders—

And we would have no legal basis whatsoever on which to lodge a complaint or an objection, as long as those troops were garrisoned outside the Panama Canal Zone. Let me repeat that:

Under the existing 1903 treaty, it is conceivable that Panama could invite or allow another country or countries to garrison troops within its borders outside the canal zone, and the United States would have no legal basis to object.

However, article V of the Neutrality Treaty now before the Senate provides that after the year 2000, when U.S. troops have departed, only the Republic of Panama shall maintain military forces, defense sites, and military installations within its national territory.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. As the Senator may know, the Senator from Kansas is interested in that particular point. What concerns this Senator is the gap between the date that these treaties are effective and the year 2000. Is that covered anywhere in the treaties, that 23-year period?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They can bring in troops now. They can garrison troops in Panama today, as long as they are not garrisoned within that 10-mile-wide strip 50 miles long of the Canal Zone, and we would have no legal basis whatever to object.

But under article V of the treaties now before us, after termination of the Panama Canal Treaty; that is, after the United States relinquishes its complete control and operation of the canal, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites, and military installations within its national territory.

So article V of the neutrality treaty is indeed an improvement over the 1903 treaty, in that it gives us assurance, it gives us a guarantee that once the United States moves out of the zone, no other country in the world can locate a military installation or a military force anywhere in Panama.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Neutrality Treaty is rejected, then we will continue to live under the 1903 treaty, and we will not have that guarantee against the location of a foreign military garrison in Panama that will be afforded by the treaty if it is approved and ratified.

Mr. DOLE. Right. The Senator from Kansas understands that, if the Senator will yield further, and that will be a matter of some contention. I have an amendment to amendment No. 11, and also an amendment about some presence after the year 2000, that will be debated at the appropriate time; but I think the explanation offered by the distinguished majority leader is helpful, and I can understand the logic that if our troops are phased out, then they lose that right for any other nation to have troops there. The logic of it does make a great deal of sense, but I believe we should examine it carefully, because it makes a difference as to whether we pursue amendment No. 11, offered by Senator Goldwater and others.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator. I read from the Foreign Relations Committee report on the Panama Canal treaties, page 143, an extract from a section-by-section analysis of the articles, and as to article V, this is what the committee has to say:

This important element of the regime of neutrality precludes the operation of the Canal, or the garrisoning of military forces or the maintenance of defense sites or other military installations in Panama, by any foreign nation after the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty. Both Parties strongly supported inclusion of this prohibition in the regime of neutrality to ensure that neither Panama nor any Canal in Panama will come under foreign domination in the future.

So, Mr. President, article V of the Neutrality Treaty now before the Senate represents an improvement over the 1903 treaty insofar as our interests are concerned, in seeing to it that no foreign power establishes military forces, defense sites, and military installations within the national territory of Panama after the year 2000. It gives us a legal basis which will be recognized in international law on which to object and to complain, and that we do not now have under the 1903 treaty.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield on that precise point for a question or two?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I do.

Mr. HATCH. As I remember that article V, it is not quite as clear to me as it apparently is to the distinguished majority leader, in whom I have a great deal of confidence.

It says:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

As I understand it, we are reducing our military bases from 17 down to 4, and turning all civil and criminal jurisdiction over to the Canal Zone.

What would stop Panama from allowing military advisers from unfriendly powers to the United States, including, as long as Panama paid for them, and there are many ways that could occur, military troops?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Nothing under the 1903 treaty would prevent that.

Mr. HATCH. And nothing under this treaty would prevent it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And nothing under the 1903 treaty would prevent it.

Mr. HATCH. Except for 17 major U.S. bases and an inviolate 10-mile zone 40 miles long, that is very well protected by the United States of America, which will not be able to protect it as well then.

I do not see where this provision is well written. I think it is ambiguous. I do not think it is helpful, and I would be glad to hear the distinguished majority leader's viewpoint with regard to that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The distinguished Senator—

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate the Senator's bringing this up; I think you are doing a great service to the Senate. You and I have had a very good relationship over this past year. I have great regard for you. I admire your ability, and I particularly respect your viewpoints on every occasion, even though we very often disagree.

I would like to have the Senator's viewpoint with regard to what I consider to be not only ambiguous but a very poorly written, very ill-defined, very inadequate text or provision with regard to the United States. I would also be interested in comments concerning my belief.

The Senator says he believes that we are better protected under this treaty. Concerning the 17 bases, they will gradually be reduced to zero by the year 2000. We will not have any military bases then. We will have given up all jurisdiction over the Panama Canal Zone. We will basically be totally unable to protect the zone. There is nothing in this provision which would prevent those alien to the interests of the United States from coming in and working with the Panamanians in their military installation sites, whose interests may be totally detrimental to the interests of the United States of America.

I would be interested in the Senator's comments. Again I express my fondest regards.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there is a bit of scripture which should be used in response to the Senator's expressions of felicitations toward me.

He that hath friends must show himself friendly.

The distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch) has friends because he shows himself friendly.

It is for the purpose of assuring, beyond any semblance of doubt whatsoever, that the United States will have the right to act against any aggression from any source after the year 2000 that the distinguished minority leader and I have offered the two amendments, one of which will address itself to this particular point, and which I hope the Senator from Utah will support.

If the amendment is adopted, that amendment in itself will make perfectly clear, as clear as the Sun in a cloudless sky, that the United States has the right to take whatever action is necessary against any aggressor.

What I am saying with respect to article V of the Neutrality Treaty is, as I have said before, it gives to us and other countries of the free world the guarantee that once the United States has relinquished its control over the Panama Canal Zone, no foreign military force or garrison can be located in the territory of Panama. That guarantee is not in the 1903 treaty.

What I am saying is, again and again and again, that under the 1903 treaty—that is what we are going to have to live with in the event these treaties are rejected—the United States would have no legal basis whatsoever upon which to complain should the Soviet Union or should Castro of Cuba locate in Panama a force of 10,000, 20,000, or 30,000 Soviet troops or Cuban troops.

What more can I say? The language of the article is clear. We all understand the import of those English words, so I think it speaks for itself. But I think it is a point which has been overlooked. I do not think the American people have realized that in this respect the Neutrality Treaty is an improvement over the 1903 treaty, in the respect I have addressed my remarks.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch).

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished majority leader. Is it not true that by the year 2000 we will no longer have any U.S. troops quartered there and, concomitantly, under this particular viewpoint, under the Neutrality Treaty, article V, it does not say that no foreign troops will be garrisoned there? It just says that only the Republic of Panama can maintain military defense sites. To me, I believe that is ambiguous. I ask this question: Is it not true that we will not have any military presence after the year 2000?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is correct, but—

Mr. HATCH. Is it not also true—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But nobody else will either.

Mr. HATCH. It does not say that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator asked me a question. He asked me if under this treaty, after the year 2000, the United States will not have any military forces stationed there. The answer is yes—yes, but, under this treaty, neither will any other nation have any military force, any military garrison, any military site, any military installation located anywhere, on any inch, of Panama's territory.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator point out in article V where it says that no military garrison, no military presence, no military troops of any other nation shall be in there, paid for by Panama or anyone else?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator now wishes to split hairs.

Mr. HATCH. No, I would rather have you—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let me read once again the clear, the indubitably clear, language of article V.

I see the distinguished Senator from Kentucky reaching for his microphone. Perhaps he would like to interject a statement here.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would just say that it is very proper that the Senator from West Virginia has pointed out this particular feature of the treaty which has been virtually overlooked in this country. I would just want to say that it has not been overlooked by the leaders of the Government in Panama nor the citizens of Panama.

When we were in Panama with the Senate in delegation which was headed up by the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd), it was a member of the Panamanian Government who pointed out to us this very feature. "It does not seem that they realize, those who are claiming that when the United States pulls out there will be a tendency for either Soviet or Russian troops, or troops from Cuba, to move in," the Government official said, "that cannot happen. The treaty specifically forbids the country of Panama from bringing into their country foreign troops of any kind."

This is a situation which does not exist now, as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has pointed out. There is nothing now that would prohibit Panama from establishing, or allowing to be established on their territory, a base from any other country.

I think this is a very significant thing. It is one that the people of Panama recognize, and one which, in my judgment, they are very, very agreeable to.

They point out time and again:

If any troops are going to be here, if any other country is going to be in Panama exercising any kind of influence over our government, if any other country is going to have any control over the Panama Canal, we want it to be the United States of America. But we want to exercise our own control over our own property and over our own country.

They are willing to accept this feature, to put into treaty the fact that there will be no troops except Panamanian troops when the treaty is ratified.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

Once again, I read article V into the Record:

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the Canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

Admiral Holloway, in his appearance before the Committee on Armed Services of the U.S. Senate said:

My position was that, ideally, I would prefer to see U.S. forces remain in the Canal indefinitely, both to operate and defend the Canal, but I would also like to see the Panamanians pleased with our presence.

In the course of the discussions that ensued, I became convinced as a result of conversations with my colleagues on the Joint Chiefs of Staff and subsequent briefings by Ambassador Bunker, Ambassador Linowitz, and the representative of the Chiefs, General Dolvin, that there was a very strong resentment to a U.S. presence in the Canal on the part of the Panamanians. I became convinced over a period of several years discussions that there was no chance of arriving at any kind of a treaty with Panama on the Canal, if the U.S. were to insist upon a presence in Panama into the indefinite future.

I decided that if we were to have a treaty, there had to be a specific date prescribed at which U.S. presence would be withdrawn.

Mr. President, there are other Senators who have been patiently waiting. I do not want to hold the floor. I wish always to respond courteously to questions from other Senators. If I may proceed now for another 5 minutes, I shall complete my statement for today and continue with my comments concerning the treaties at some point during the week after next.

At this point, Mr. President, it is appropriate to recall the strong support given the treaties by our top military officials—those who currently have the responsibility for our national security. I urge all Senators to review the statements made by these military leaders in their testimony before Senate committees. The Joint Chiefs have repeatedly emphasized that, as Gen. Louis H. Wilson, Commandant of the Marine Corps, has said:

The real value of the canal lies in its continued and assured use.

I also point to the words of Adm. James L. Holloway III, Chief of Naval Operations, who told the Committee on Armed Services:

Our adherence to these treaties, which make the Panamanians our direct partners in the defense of the canal, will substantially contribute to a friendly and cooperative attitude among all Latin Americans toward the United States on the Panama Canal issue. This favorable effect which I believe the treaties will have on the attitudes of Panamanians and Central Americans toward our continued use of the canal * * * will, in my opinion, substantially assist the United States to defend the canal against the internal threat. Therefore, I am convinced that the continuing use of the Panama Canal for national security purposes is best assured through the provisions of "the new treaties."

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Senator will allow me now to finish my statement so other Senators may speak, the Senator himself may wish to speak. I hope he does not feel me disrespectful.

Mr. HATCH. I do not. If he would yield on this one point, it would define my position better.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope so.

Mr. HATCH. I hope so, also.

I am interested to know if the distinguished majority leader is aware that in the 1936 modifications of the 1903 treaty—which is, of course, reaffirmed in the 1955 modification of the 1903 treaties—all of which must be considered together, in toto, and taking into consideration that the distinguished majority leader has made the point, as has the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, that we are better off under article V of the proposed Neutrality Treaty, is the distinguished majority leader aware of article 10 in the 1936 treaty regarding Panama? There, it says:

In case of an international conflagration or the existence of any threat of aggression which would endanger the security of the Republic of Panama or the neutrality or security of the Panama Canal, the Governments of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama will take such measures of prevention and defense as they may consider necessary for the protection of their common interests. Any measures, in safeguarding such interests, which shall appear essential to one Government to take, and which may affect the territory under the jurisdiction of the other Government, will be the subject of consultation between the two Governments.

I believe that that provides much more protection to the United States of America, considering our 17 bases, considering the inviolability of the Canal Zone, considering all matters, than this very loosely worded, ambiguous, shortly worded article V, which does not include, I think, the very good language of the distinguished majority leader, which he thinks it does include.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The fact that article V is shortly worded does not mean that it is ambiguous and not clear. The Gettysburg Address was shortly worded. It did not take Lincoln over 3 or 4 minutes to make it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the Senator yield for one comment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The Senator from Utah described a situation where a threat is present and imminent. We are talking about a situation where there may be no threat.

Mr. HATCH. If they move foreign government troops into a territory, that is not threatening?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course not.

Mr. HATCH. Of course not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the country of Panama should decide that they want to give a submarine base to a foreign country, I think we would be hard-pressed to prove that is a direct threat.

Mr. HATCH. With Russia, I would not be hard-pressed at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In international law, I think we would have a hard time proving it. But this article would prevent that submarine base from being established.

Mr. HATCH. So does article X of the 1936 treaty and that is my point. It prevents it a lot better than this loosely worded article.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky: I do not agree with that at all.

Article X to which Senator Hatch has alluded says, "In case of an international conflagration or in the existence of any threat of aggression."

Mr. HATCH. "which would endanger the security of the Republic of Panama or the neutrality or security of the Panama Canal," and so on.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now the Senator from Utah is saying that if country X were to station some troops in Panama at the invitation of the Government of Panama, under article X of the 1936 treaty, we could consider that to be an international conflagration.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. In other words, he says that the presence of foreign troops in Panama would constitute an act, would, ipso facto, constitute an act of aggression. Does the presence of United States troops in South Korea today constitute an act of aggression?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What about Cuba at Guantanamo Bay? Is that aggression?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. What about Guantanamo Bay? What about the presence of American military personnel there? Does that constitute an act of aggression?

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. If I may say so, I think this is a very good example of treaty provisions that have been written that are extremely strong from the American point of view.

Mr. HATCH. Which one, the neutrality treaty or the other one?

Mr. SARBANES. I will develop why it is strong from the American point of view.

Mr. HATCH. Which one is the Senator reading from?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order? I have the floor and I have yielded to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Nunn). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator from Utah will allow me to make my point, which I would like to make a developed way, I shall be happy to yield to him, or ask the majority leader to yield for him to raise the question. But I would at least like to be able to make the point.

I thank the Senator from Utah.

This is an example of a provision which is extremely strong from the American point of view. Under the treaties that are before us, the United States need not consult with anyone to take the action it deems necessary to protect the neutrality of the canal. I say to the Senator from Utah, I would rather have that provision and the ability to act as we deem necessary to protect American interests than the provision which the Senator has cited from the earlier treaty, which requires consultation and which may well prevent or impede the United States from acting with the speed that is necessary to defend our interests.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now, Mr. President, I do not want to continue to hold the floor, but I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Utah for rebuttal.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I respect the comments of the distinguished Senator from Maryland. However, just to make the record clear, I would suggest that this very loosely worked provision of article V of the Neutrality Treaty does not do nearly as much for us as having 17 bases controlling the jurisdiction of Panama Canal, operating it ourselves, and of course being able to prevent aggressors from coming into Panama.

I submit that we are far better off securitywise and in every other way if we would go back and renegotiate these treaties. They would be favorable to both nations, not just to Panama.

I would also suggest, with all due respect to the majority leader, that I do not believe article V says what he says it says.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. Huddleston addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, article V just nips the whole process in the bud—in the bud—and it is far more clearly and unambiguously worded than are the words of the 1936 treaty to which the distinguished Senator from Utah has repeatedly referred.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, just to point out, the comment made by the distinguished Senator from Utah about his judgment puts him in direct conflict with the judgment of every military commander, including those who are in Panama today commanding the troops, who are there charged with the responsibility of defending the canal, including our Secretary of Defense who is charged with the responsibility of defending the United States of America, as to the security aspects of the two treaties that we are discussing.

We can all have our own opinions. But I think we have to give some weight to those individuals who have spent a lifetime in the service of this country, in the defense of it, and in their judgment as to what is best to secure the United States interests in Panama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, those of us who have visited Panama have had an opportunity to see the potential vulnerability of the canal and related facilities. When our delegation discussed this with U.S. military officials in Panama, Lt. Gen. Dennis P. McAuliffe, Commander in Chief of the Southern Command, told us that the canal is vulnerable to sabotage and said it would be literally impossible to keep a determined force—even a small one—from causing some disturbance, some interruption in use of the canal.

He said that the very first thing that would have to be done, the Panama Canal railroad would have to be written off—written off.

All of these military officials agree that our wisest course lies in the direction of cooperation with Panama, not confrontation. Ratification of the treaties would create an environment of cooperation and give Panama a greater stake in the efficient operation of the canal. Failure to ratify would not only heighten the prospects for confrontation in the canal area but would give new impetus to extremist elements throughout the region. As Defense Secretary Brown stated:

If I were Castro and I wanted to expand my influence and decrease that of the United States, I would certainly do all I could to prevent ratification of these treaties.

Mr. President, in my comments today I have stressed one or two important considerations related to the treaties, especially that consideration which deals with our own national security interests.

In summing up, a secure, open canal is our primary objective and interest.

There is almost no way, regardless of the number of American troops that might be stationed in the canal area, that we could guarantee 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, the unimpeded, uninterrupted operation of the canal in a hostile environment.

As Admiral Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations, has said, defending successfully against such threats in the formidable jungle terrain of the canal area would be extremely difficult, and uninterrupted operation of the canal could not be guaranteed. If we made an all-out effort we could generally manage to keep the canal open and operating, but we could not prevent interruptions, and even then it would be at an enormous price.

Think of the devastating impact it would have on U.S. relations on other nations in the hemisphere. Think of the disastrous effect on world commerce and the damage to U.S. business interests if transiting the canal became risky. There would undoubtedly be a sharp drop in its worldwide usage.

What good is the canal economically or militarily if it cannot be used?

I return again finally to this basic point, the value of the canal is in its use and that use is best guaranteed by cooperation, mutual respect, and understanding, which these treaties would create.

We are not, to use the words of some of the proponents of the treaties, giving away the canal. We are acting from strength and not from weakness.

This is a matter of the wise and judicious use of power—power. Power is one thing, but to know how to use it and when to use it is the important thing.

This is a matter of wise and judicious use of power by the most powerful nation in the world. These treaties are in the best interests of the United States and we should act now with vision and foresight and reason to approve them.

As author David McCullough stated so succinctly, "I support the treaties because I support the canal."

Mr. President, I thank Senators for their indulgence and patience. I shall continue the reading of my statement on another day.

I yield the floor.

Mr. Dole addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first of all, I wish to thank the distinguished majority leader and others who participated in the exchange.

It seems to me that whether we are being turned on or turned off around the country may have a bearing on what finally happens with reference to the ratification process.

The Senator from Kansas would state at the outset that I do not really believe we will ever satisfy every Senator, either proponents or opponents, of every article, of every sentence, of every comma. So I guess perhaps what we must find is some way to come together, if we can, and if we cannot, then we will have to follow another course.

I would suggest, while we are all writing profiles in courage, that perhaps there are some who may oppose the treaties and some who may support the treaties who fit that category.

Certainly, the distinguished majority leader throughout the course of several weeks withheld his support because of reservations he had about the treaties. He made a judgment based on changes that would come about.

There is no doubt in this Senator's mind that with 77 cosponsors, it is fair to say the amendments referred to will be adopted and when adopted will strengthen the hand of the treaty proponents, as it should, or as the adoption should.

Now, as we square off in the proper way in the debate in the Senate, as some have noted, there must not be much interest in the Senate because at this very moment only six or seven Senators are present out of 100. If we apply the same percentage across America, perhaps only 6 percent to 7 percent of the American people have a real concern about the treaties. But I suggest that that would be a mistake.

Many Senators, of course, have other obligations. Many Senators have committee obligations, constituent obligations. Some are necessarily absent; some may be snowbound at this time.

The point is that whoever votes for or against the treaties will be casting a very important and a very difficult vote, from the standpoint of politics. I am inclined to agree with those who say that we should not be tabulators, that there comes a time when we at least should listen to the people who sent us here, because they do have a right of recall that comes around every 6 years in the Senate and every 2 years in the House, although the House has no direct role to play in advising and consenting on treaties.

For some time, this Senator has been trying to figure out where to come down on the treaties. What is the right decision? Weighing all the factors, including the political factor, what is the right decision?

This Senator is not running for reelection in 1978, but others are. Some who are running are unopposed, and some may have opposition. That makes a difference, too. That is a factor we must consider.

When the people across America listen to the debate, they must understand that that factor is always present. There may be some pure statemanship in this body, but I think there is always a little dose of politics—not partisan politics, but a little dose of reality. We like it here. We run for office because we like our work. We are willing, as some say, to rise above principle. We are willing to bite the bullet. But I think we must be assured, whether we vote for or against the treaties, that we have made the right choice; because if we are not comfortable with the choice we make, we are in a great deal of trouble at the outset.

As I indicated 2 days ago, I have been in the Senate 10 years. I have felt proper pressure from the executive branch and other distinguished Americans, but never have I been so courted as I have been with reference to the Panama Canal Treaties.

I have had the high privilege of a private visit with the President of the United States in the Oval Office. He indicated his grave concern for the treaties. I will not discuss what was said, but I think it is fairly well understood that he would like to see the treaties ratified. He would like to see Senate approval of both treaties. That was on Friday of last week.

On Sunday of last week, a friend of mine, former President Gerald Ford, called me and just wanted to visit, and the treaties came up early in the visit.

He said, "Bob, are you locked in?"

I said, "Well, I am not certain. I'm probably leaning against, but I don't believe I'm locked in."

It seems to me that progress has been made; the American people are still concerned; but I am not one who has taken a firm position. I do not have the same concerns about the sovereignty issue as some of my colleagues who certainly are as well motivated as this Senator and as honest in their convictions as this Senator. But I do not have that particular problem.

We had a good visit. I think we even went over the campaign again, and it ended up the same. We lost. [Laughter.]

Then, on Monday, Ambassador Robert Strauss called the Senator from Kansas and in his own inimitable style, which I cannot repeat, discussed with me the treaties. He indicated that, for the first time, he was looking to me as a statesman, which I appreciated. I said nice things about him, too, and we had a good visit.

Then, as if it were all programmed, I had a call from former Vice President Rockefeller. We had a good visit, and he just happened to mention the treaties.

Then, on Tuesday, I heard from former Secretary of State Kissinger, who is a friend of mine, and he just happened to call to mention the treaties.

I say, first of all, that that indicates a very concerted, well-coordinated, proper effort by those who support the treaties in their present form. They certainly have that right. And we are somewhat flattered, I assume, as anyone would be if he were called by those particular people, outstanding men in this case, who have been leaders, in one way or another, of our country.

So it is a very difficult decision we have to make. I assume that some have already decided that those who oppose the treaties are wrong. Some have decided that those who support the treaties are wrong.

I suppose there is no possible way for Senators to make a determination on just which way they will finally go. It seems to this Senator that we are in one of those debates in which the debate itself can make the difference, where responsible amendments can make the difference.

I understand the dilemma faced by the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader. They have now decided that the best course to follow is to go forth with two amendments—if possible, to bring up these two amendments before we get into the Panama Canal Treaty. In other words, take the Neutrality Treaty first, which really should come second, but to take it first because it strengthens their hand.

The Senator from Kansas does not fault that. That is known as strategy, and probably pretty good strategy, because it does improve the treaties, and I would guess that perhaps one or two might vote against those amendments—maybe not many more.

The Senator from Kansas was trying to determine yesterday whether that was the end. Is there some agreement to fight back every other amendment, however meritorious, and say, "That is the end"? I would hope not, because it seems to me that there are some Senators—probably every Senator—who may be looking for flaws in the treaty, who may understand the need for some changes; and I hope they will be considered and voted upon without some stonewall effort by the Foreign Relations Committee or by the leadership.

So we will go through that process: There will be the amendments first, then the resolution of ratification, then understandings and reservations. Some will offer understandings; some will indicate that is enough for them. Others will have reservations that would not require another plebiscite or renegotiations.

However, there is another matter that I wish to speak to this morning, and I say it without any trepidation, but indicate that it does bear directly on the treaties themselves.

For the past several months—maybe it has been a wasted effort; maybe it should not have been pursued—there have been a number of allegations, and I stress the word "allegations" to whoever may be listening, about possible drug trafficking with leaders of Panama, international drug trafficking affecting the United States.

On three previous occasions, starting back on October 13, 1977, the Senator from Kansas has addressed this issue and made statements on the floor. Those efforts to get information and to get evidence have continued.

It is still my conviction that one way to bring about confidence and maybe pick up support in the Senate is to level with the Senate and to level with the American people.

So I am convinced that the Carter administration owes the American people and certainly Senators an honest and aboveboard explanation of the so-called Panama connection in international drug trafficking.

We are asking the American people to accept on faith the Panamanian guarantees. They have not seen the negotiating documents. I doubt that too many have read the treaties. They have not seen all the efforts that went into these treaties, some 13 years I understand. But they are being asked to accept much on faith insofar as Panamanian guarantees under the canal treaties are concerned. They are being asked to trust the credibility and integrity of Panama's leaders. They are being asked to consent to higher annual toll payments to Panama which will surely strengthen the political and economic position of the Torrijos regime. Since the American people and particularly the Senate itself, because we are going to vote, in the final analysis, are being asked to support these propositions, it is only reasonable that they expect answers to the drug-related questions that have been raised.

And I shall continue to ask the Carter administration to tell the full story. Failing that, I feel and believe very strongly it may be appropriate for the Senate to go in what we call a closed-door session where we literally lock the doors, close the galleries, admit Senators only and a few other people, and have a discussion, first of all, whether there should be a secret session and if it is agreed there should be, then we lay out to Senators some of this sensitive information that apparently is around here somewhere about drug trafficking.

It seems to me that not one Senator should be asked to vote until he has all the information possible. Let me say, also, that I have no interest in prolonging the debate on the treaties unnecessarily. We have a great deal of work to do in Congress this year in 1978.

I have no interest in dragging some irrelevant topic into the treaty issue, but the drug question and I emphasize the word "question" is a tangential matter that should be discussed and resolved in our own minds early in this debate.

Apparently the Senate leadership and members of the Select Committee on Intelligence have already been briefed on the matter by Attorney General Griffin Bell and by the Drug Enforcement Administrator Peter Bensinger, and perhaps their concerns have been resolved. They have had access to the full story. But others have questions and I have questions, and I know many of my colleagues have questions. And I would hazard a guess that many of the American people have questions. They want to know the facts, and they deserve an answer.

So I would hope that the Senate leadership would take the initiative as they have taken the initiative in many other areas in this debate in trying to propose or promulgate or otherwise come across amendments that might strengthen the treaties. I would hope that they would take the initiative in calling for an early Senate discussion of this matter behind closed doors, if necessary, and I understand that because of the sensitivity of the information it might be necessary, but given the leadership's familiarity with the material, I would hope they would take the lead in advising the rest of us. But if for reasons that undoubtedly would be good the leadership should make that decision and decide not to follow that course, then the Senator from Kansas is prepared to offer a motion for a closed session. That motion will be supported by a number of Senators including the distinguished Senator from Utah, Senator Hatch, and the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Senator Goldwater, who is also a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

It just seems to me that if it takes that, then we ought to have the information. We ought to have it early in the debate and we ought to forget about it; we ought to push out the drug problems.

They ought to be explained, they ought to be explored and then if we are satisfied, they ought to be forgotten because we are here to debate the treaties and not some outside issue.

But I must say to my colleague and to anyone else who may be listening that I have been asked on several occasions why I did not exercise my privilege as a United States Senator to review confidence files on this subject, which are in the possession of the Senate Intelligence Committee. But quite truly I have considered that alternative a number of times, but I have so far rejected it. That decision requires further explanation for those who may be unfamiliar with the ramifications of going in and examining Intelligence Committee files.

I have been advised by the Administrator of the United States Drug Enforcement Administration that the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has "copies of all DEA"—that is Drug Enforcement Administration—"files regarding this matter and material from other agencies as well."

That is fine. But what many people do not know and certainly the American people do not know is that under provisions of Senate Resolution 400, which was enacted by the 94th Congress when we established the Select Committee on Intelligence, the confidential materials may be reviewed by any Member of the Senate, but you cannot make notes, you cannot make copies, you cannot even leave that session saying whether it confirms or denies your suspicion. In other words, you are effectively gagged. Even if you found something that ought to be told to the American people, and I guess as long as it is covered up by some national security classification, there is not a thing you can do about it.

So it seems to me and I have had access—I have not rifled any files; I have not burglarized anyone—but I have had come to my office two documents that just ended up on my desk that contained certain allegations. I have had delivered to me from another unknown, unnamed source four or five documents. I have had a list showing 44 different file numbers indicating some connection between Torrijos and drug trafficking.

The Senator from Kansas would suggest that the American people are concerned about drug trafficking, particularly the parents in this country. I found in reviewing my mail, not the postcards, not the generated mail, but mail written long before we got into the struggle over who could send the most, nearly half the people who had written me from Kansas and other States had opposition to the treaties because of Torrijos, because they had no confidence in this dictator, despite his charm and despite the problems he has—and this treaty is not easy for General Torrijos either—but for wondering how to swing public opinion we better start addressing the problem and one of those problems is Torrijos himself.

Is he involved or has he been involved or should he be involved in an investigation concerning drug trafficking? I am putting in the Record today a letter from Mr. Bensinger, who is a little upset with me because I indicated he has not been cooperative.

He indicates that he is willing to be cooperative but he has already turned the material over and he says that Torrijos is not the target of an investigation and I quote:

As we indicated at that time, General Torrijos has never been a target of investigation.

Well, that is fine. But should he have been a target of investigation? And if some of the allegations set forth in some of the documents are true, though I have been cautioned many are based on hearsay, why was he not a target of an investigation?

So it seems to me that some of us are caught in a bind.

I attended a meeting the other morning of the Foreign Relations Committee where the distinguished Senator from Arizona and the distinguished Senator from Indiana, Senator Bayh, were going to brief members of the Foreign Relations Committee. I was invited because of my interest in the drug problem. I was treated with every courtesy. I did not go there to grandstand. I did not go there to walk out and have a press conference, and did not. I went there to find out if I could learn about the drug problem without being gagged.

And I was told properly so that "You know, if you listen to this sensitive material, this is the end." So I had no choice. Either you had to compromise your freedom to speak out, maybe your integrity later on if something leaked, and they said, "Ah, Senator Dole was in that committee room; maybe he did it."

So it seemed to me that the proper course was to leave that meeting of distinguished Senators and I did, on a very friendly basis and everybody understood that.

I do not know what was said. I am certain that everything was laid out cold turkey. Everybody had a chance to see what they saw and maybe everyone must be satisfied. I have not heard a single leak since the meeting.

But it seems to me that we have to make a choice. As I said, I have received two photocopies of U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration files directly implicating the leader of Panama, based on hearsay.

I also said recently that we live in Cynic City sometimes, where everybody is looking under a rock trying to name some Member of Congress or some member of the executive who may be involved in some hanky-panky. I do not want to leave any impression that we are trying to do this to General Torrijos, but there have been allegations made, and the allegations come from responsible people.

Maybe Jack Anderson has a better source than we have in the Senate. He indicated he has just yesterday morning. He indicates he also has the facts, and that Torrijos is not involved. Maybe he should share those facts with those of us in the Senate. If we cannot get it from the Drug Enforcement Administration, maybe Mr. Anderson will give us the information, if he is satisfied. He is a good investigator, and he has made an investigation.

I understand from talking with the distinguished Senator from Arizona just 10 minutes ago that the Senate Intelligence Committee will issue a report. It may be somewhat sanitized. I had a report from the Drug Enforcement Administration of 75 pages that was almost totally sanitized. All I ended up with was a bunch of newspaper clippings. But that report, coming from the Senate Intelligence Committee as a result of the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, may be helpful.

I would just say finally that this is not a red herring. This is not an effort to sidetrack the debate on the treaties. The Senator from Kansas hopefully has offered responsible amendments. They may fail. They may be found to be without merit.

But I suggest that this is not some way to defeat the treaties. So I would just ask that we have that session early. And as one Senator who has talked about it at length in the past several months, if there is a clear indication of no involvement, that will be the last word this Senator has to say. If there is an indication of some involvement, and we are all in a secret session, I guess we could not say anything anyway. That poses another dilemma.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I addressed to Mr. Bensinger dated February 3, 1978, and his response dated February 7, 1978, be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., February 3, 1978.

HON. PETER BENSINGER,
Administrator, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BENSINGER: I was recently provided with certain documents which appear to be copies of DEA Investigation Reports. These documents contain specific reports alleging involvement by General Omar Torrijos of Panama in drug-trafficking operations in the Western hemisphere. As a member of the United States Senate who will be requested to pass judgment on ratification of a new Treaty with the Government of Panama, I feel a responsibility to my constituents and to the national interest to make a formal inquiry concerning this information.

On October 14, I formally submitted a Freedom-of-Information request for specific DEA files which I understood contain information on this matter. The selected materials which I subsequently received from DEA on December 16 did not include the attached documents.

In particular, I want to know if you can confirm the authenticity of these documents and, further, I would like to know if the allegations contained in these documents have been verified or disproved by the Drug Enforcement Administration.

In my opinion, these reports, if authentic and verified, raise serious doubts about the personal integrity of the government leader with whom we have been dealing on a basis of mutual trust. They raise questions about the advisability of enhancing the financial and political base of General Torrijos through our ratification of the proposed Canal Treaties.

In view of these concerns, I respectfully request your assessment of the accuracy, and validity of the allegations contained in these reports. I will look forward to hearing from you at an early date, and would appreciate a written response for my files.

Sincerely yours,

BOB DOLE,
U.S. Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION,
OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR,
Washington, D.C., February 7, 1978.

HON. ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE. This will confirm my telephone conversation with your Legislative Assistant, Bob Downen, regarding your letter of February 3, 1978 received in our office yesterday.

As I indicated to Mr. Downen, I will be pleased to brief you personally with respect to the two documents which were included with your letter. The two files in question reflect hearsay information which I am available to review with you in person and at your immediate convenience.

I also indicated to Mr. Downen that I felt your characterization of February 2, 1978 on the floor of the Senate with respect to withholding information from you and other Senators was less than fair and candid. Our agency is conforming to the specific request and direction of the Senate leadership of both parties that files regarding Panamanian officials and the family of General Omar Torrijos be made available specifically to the Senate Intelligence Committee. Furthermore, the release of information on individuals is subject to the Freedom of Information Act, and our response is governed not by personal arbitrary decisions, but by that Act.

On October 6, 1977, Attorney General Bell and I briefed the Senate leadership of both parties and Senators Byrd, Inouye, Baker, and Goldwater directed us to work with the Senate Intelligence Committee. We have complied fully with that directive and have furnished them complete file information. As we indicated at that time, General Omar Torrijos has never been a target of investigation.

I have been advised that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has received a briefing on this matter from the Senate Intelligence Committee. I want to again reaffirm that I will be available to meet with you at your convenience in the immediate future.

Sincerely,

PETER B. BENSINGER, Administrator.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment on this point?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Baker) is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from Kansas for yielding. I was not on the floor at the beginning part of his remarks, but it is my understanding he suggested that the leadership of the Senate should possibly take the initiative in calling for an executive session.

I wanted to respond, if my information in that respect is correct, by saying I think that would be a fine idea. As the Senator from Kansas knows, on last Tuesday during our regular weekly Republican policy committee meeting, I indicated that I have favored a secret session of the Senate so that every Senator would have full access to all of the information that members of the Senate Intelligence Committee have had. I am a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee ex officio, as is the distinguished majority leader, by reason of our positions, not by reason of full membership on the committee. But I would be most pleased to join with either Senator Byrd as majority leader, or, for that matter, with the Senator from Kansas, in asking for an executive session, which I think should be held as the first order of business when we return from the Lincoln Day recess.

I might say one other thing, Mr. President. It is my understanding of the rules that an executive session of the Senate is subject to the same constraints on security and the prohibition against release of information that a meeting of the Intelligence Committee would be. However, it is my further understanding that under the rules and precedents of the Senate, the Senate could lift that injunction of secrecy on a matter material to a measure under consideration by the Senate. So I would think we could publish any parts of that inquiry if generally relevant to the matter under debate by the Senate. I have no idea what the Senate would think of the details; but I, for one, do not want to have the Senate proceed with some Senators knowing more than others.

Mr. CASE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Let me respond first to the remarks of the minority leader. I appreciate them very much, and know of Senator Baker's interest. In fact, he may not recall, but last October 13, when we had a hearing, the Senator was there, and he showed an interest in the effort at that time which has never faltered.

It seems to me that even if we did not, under some constraint, develop anything, we would know whether the allegations were based on an effort to discredit the leader of the country, and if so, we could wipe that out and proceed.

Mr. BAKER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. After the Senator left the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee the other morning—

Mr. DOLE. On a friendly basis.

Mr. CASE. On a completely friendly basis, which he did in order not to compromise his freedom of action in the future or to raise any possible question as to where he got some information—specifically that he did not get it from a briefing by the Intelligence Committee which would have placed some restraint, I presume, on its use. After the Senator left, as I said, we did have a briefing. It was in complete detail. I know this because, as a member of the Intelligence Committee, I had had this before.

After the briefing was given, and questions asked and answered, we on the Foreign Relations Committee asked that a sanitized version of the report be prepared for the use of everyone as quickly as possible.

I also would join with the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Tennessee in urging such lifting of restrictions as may be necessary to bring any relevant information out in public view, so that all Senators and all Americans can have it.

As the Senator knows, the Senate Intelligence Committee made a formal report on this matter some time ago, and made public the general conclusion that nothing that existed in this area had affected the negotiation of the treaties or the U.S. position on it. That, of course, is a matter of record also.

But I repeat again, if anything is found that needs to be done to reassure our Senate colleagues and the people of this country that there is nothing sinister or hidden in the matter, I would join in any proper request also.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee. I am aware of his willingness.

I do not have any objection to doing that. It seems to me that it may not be directly related to the treaties, but it still goes to the question of the credibility of the leader, whether or not we are prepared to support whatever may come from those sessions.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, first I want to associate myself with the remarks of both Senator Baker and Senator Case. I too, join in whatever lifting of the injunction of secrecy and any secret session we need in order to explore this matter. But I must say I think a word of caution should be injected at this point. The Senator used the right words. He used the words "red herring" and "diversion." Just a minute ago he used the words "question of the credibility of the leader," to wit, General Torrijos.

I think it should be made clear, because we are a very fair people, and because a lot of dust is thrown around about drug contacts, et cetera, that there are two questions: First, the big question, is what does this have to do with the treaty? General Torrijos will not be around forever. The first arrangement of these treaties is for 22 years. I doubt that I will be around in the year 2000. I hope I am, but I doubt it.

So the providence for the American people must be based upon what we are agreeing to. I know Senator Dole does not have it, I have absolute confidence in his good faith but we must not let anybody get an idea that if their arguments are going to break down on the treaty—and I believe the proponents have the best of that argument—that the next thing is going to be a personal attack on Torrijos, when it may not make any difference whether Torrijos is there or not.

That is the way the American people ought to judge this treaty. Would the Senator agree with me on that? Sure, let us find out all we can about this, investigate it any way anyone wants to, not have all this nonsense about secrecy; that really is not necessary. I have no objection to that whatever.

Is it not true that even if Torrijos had his hands in drugs, and nobody has that proof—as a matter of fact, Bensinger says no—still, the question before the American people is: Is this a good treaty for the American people? That is the issue. This may, in the minds of some, bear on it, but let us keep our eye firm on the real issue, especially as we get into this particular kind of corollary issue. Will the Senator agree with that?

Mr. DOLE. I believe with most of it. The point I made, perhaps before the Senator arrived, is that we are talking about public opinion having an impact. I have been trying to analyze some of the genuine mail which came to my office. About 48 percent are opposing in some way the treaties because of Torrijos. If we can erase this one issue, if there is not any reason to suggest any possible charge that had any merit, that helps the proponents of the treaty.

As far as I am concerned, I certainly agree we ought to get it up, get it out, and get on with it.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield for one more instant?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator has put his finger on a very important point. The proponents of the treaty have to convince the American people that after all this is a good treaty and good for the American people. We do not have to prove that General Torrijos is an angel or not, whether he is involved in drugs or not. I do not know what he has been involved in. I do know he has been involved in the denial of political and human rights, which may be morally just as culpable. But I just plead that we keep our eye fixed on the ball, and the ball is, Torrijos or no Torrijos, is this good for America? I believe it is. Let us fight it out on that ground.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOLE. I would be happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I first of all want to applaud the Senator from Kansas for his perception of this issue as one which is not unimportant, but one which should be discussed, and be discussed in closed session.

I applaud the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. Javits) for saying precisely what I believe—let us keep our eyes on the ball; let us keep our eyes on the treaties. In the final judgment of this, let us judge the treaties on the basis of their merits or demerits and not on what may be considered peripheral issues.

These peripheral issues, whatever they may be, are rightfully matters of concern, but the basic question in our decision should be, are the treaties themselves, Torrijos or no Torrijos, in the best interests of the United States?

Now as to a closed session, I heard what the distinguished minority leader said, and I heard what the distinguished Senator from Kansas said. I would agree that we ought to get these matters out of the way. Let us have a closed session. Let us discuss them. Then let us clear the air and get it behind us.

It takes only two Senators to put the Senate into closed session, but in order that all Senators may know when that closed session would occur I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, a week from next Tuesday—in other words, on February 21—the Senate, at 10 o'clock a.m. go into closed session for a discussion of the issues to which the distinguished Senator from Kansas had addressed himself.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Baker).

Mr. BAKER. I will not object, Mr. President. I simply want to say to the majority leader I think that is a good arrangement. The Senate will go out at approximately 5 o'clock today. We will be in a nonlegislative period until, I believe, the 20th of February.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And a nonexecutive period.

Mr. BAKER. We will be home. Anyway, that would be the day following the reconvening of the Senate, which I think is as quickly as we could do it under these circumstances. I think that is a good date and time. If it is satisfactory to the Senator from Kansas, I would certainly be happy to concur.

Mr. DOLE. Reserving the right to object, and I will certainly not object, before we get into questions in that session could we have a briefing for Senators, the briefing which was made available to the Foreign Relations Committee? Could that be possible before that closed session?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I could reserve the right to object one moment further in order to answer the Senator, under Senate Resolution 400, the resolution creating the intelligence committee, each Senator is entitled to the information in the possession of that committee. I would hope the senior Senator from Arizona, the ranking Republican on the committee, and the distinguished Senator from Indiana, could arrange a way so that Senators would be fully prepared in advance of the executive session and be aware of all the documentation we are discussing before the 21st. I see the Senator from Arizona is on the floor. I do not see the Senator from Indiana, but I will talk to him as well.

Mr. DOLE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, would there be adequate time? If some come into the session not having been briefed by the Intelligence Committee, I am not certain how productive the session would be. I am just wondering as a matter of practicality—and I think the Senator from Arizona would have a thought on this—whether, on that date, the 21st of February, if the Senators from Arizona and Indiana could brief those of us who are here. Would that be possible or would it have to be done outside the Chamber?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Probably the best way to do it, if we want a briefing, is to use that part of S. Res. 400 which allows any Senator, at any time, to go to the committee headquarters and to view any subject which is top secret. It would not take the Senator long to peruse the material we have. I have just informed the staff and informed Senator Bayh of the decision of the leadership. I think it is a very wise idea. Whether we like it or not, reports on this matter are circulating all over the country. I think it would be wise to open it up to all Members so they can make their own judgments as to whether there is anything to these charges or not, or whether they would have a bad bearing on the treaty.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Might it be possible to ask the Senator from Arizona to arrange, say, on Monday, the 20th of February, in advance of the executive session, for the documents to be together in one place with a sufficient number of the Intelligence Committee staff members so that Senators who care to avail themselves of that right could appear there in that hearing room on the 20th and prepare themselves for the executive session on the 21st?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to commit my chairman (Mr. Bayh). I am just the ranking Republican member. But I think it would be possible. It has been done before. We can probably do it over in the committee headquarters.

As I say, it would not take long. I hope that Senator Bayh will get to the floor, but the staff is aware of this and they are attempting to reach him now.

Mr. CASE. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. CASE. We still have to take into account the provisions of Senate Resolution 400, and disclosure would be made pursuant to the provisions of that resolution. I cannot imagine anybody being unwilling to accept those provisions as binding upon himself, but that would have to be done, of course.

Mr. GOLDWATER. We all understand that.

Mr. CASE. Well, Senator Dole was not very happy about it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Nobody would be allowed to use that material—

Mr. CASE. Except pursuant to the resolution.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Pursuant to the resolution. We, of course, can use the sanitized version.

Mr. DOLE. That raises a question, because if we use that material and it is discussed on the Senate floor the following day and we vote to release that to the public, are we violating Senate Resolution 400?

Mr. GOLDWATER. You would have to have the permission of the Senate. As I understand Senate Resolution 400, we can vote in executive session whether or not it should remain so classified.

Mr. BAKER. If the Senator will yield, I think that is correct. The Senate, as a body, could determine whether or not certain information is to be declassified if that information were already in the possession of the Senate through the Senate Intelligence Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am awaiting word from Senator Bayh, chairman of the Committee on Intelligence, who is listening to this debate in his office. Shortly, I anticipate his arrival and response.

I merely want to amend my request, in case there is a misunderstanding of it, to have it include not only the drug issue, but also the intelligence issue, wiretapping, or any of these other issues that have been kicked around, so that it can all be done on the same day.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. Senator Bayh is on his way to the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Senator Case and I have just briefly conferred on this matter. There is included in this classified report a case that we would not want to talk about, because it cannot be released. It has nothing to do with the subject we are talking about now, but we do have information such as the leader has mentioned that, when Senator Bayh gets here, we can interrogate him about. As I say, I am sort of Tail-End Charlie, just trying to uphold right for the Republicans.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Kansas has yielded.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Hodges). The question is withheld for the time being.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me ask Senator Goldwater a question. He and Senator Bayh have appeared before us with regard to this letter. Is it not true that the statement came out of that to the effect that this material that the Intelligence Committee had did not reflect upon the negotiations?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is true. In fact, it did not mention—it is not mentioned in the report. I can tell that much. We were told, of course, that it did not reflect.

Senator Bayh is here and I should like him to speak for the committee.

Mr. DOLE. While they are conferring, let me say that I do not suppose the report would mention the negotiations. The only point that some of us have—maybe no one but this Senator—is that if, in fact, the allegations are true and there is some drug trafficking by Torrijos, can he be trusted as a guarantor of the treaties? Is he trustworthy, and is he credible? I think those are the basic points that the American people would like to throw around, at least, and think about.

Also, we have to understand, if we pass these treaties, that we are going to insure Torrijos' power and going to give him a big boost economically and a great deal of strength in the years to come.

I think we should know about his activities and what type of regime we are about to strengthen. That is how they are related, though they may not be in any Senate intelligence report.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. On that point, I want to follow on what Senator Javits said. The allegations are something we ought to look into but I suggest that we could be dealing with the most angelic person in the world and if the terms of the treaty did not protect American interests, I would oppose the treaty no matter how lovely the person on the other side was. So, in the end, we must go back to the terms of the treaty and see how they protect American interests.

There is one other point I wanted to make. Earlier in his statement the Senator from Kansas said that the DEA had not responded, had not been forthcoming. I simply want it understood that we established a procedure in the last session of Congress, unrelated to this issue, to deal with the whole question of how we should handle very sensitive intelligence information.

The Senate imposed those restrictions upon itself in its judgment that this was a responsible way to act. We are not being gagged. We decided that when we are dealing with extremely sensitive matters, there should be a procedure whereby we could be informed and yet sensitive intelligence be protected. We established a Select Committee on Intelligence that could act in an oversight capacity and we placed certain checks upon how that information will be made available and how it can be used by Members of the Senate.

I understand the situation of the Senator from Kansas. I was present at the Foreign Relations Committee when he came. I understand that he felt that for the sake of his own freedom of action, since he was getting information from an independent source—

Mr. DOLE. I might say an unknown source.

Mr. SARBANES. From an unknown source—that he did not want to come under Senate Resolution 400 with the limitations it carries. But I think it is important to understand that the procedure is not something which has just been developed here. This is a procedure that was very carefully thought through and developed by the Senate as the way to handle responsibly very extensive intelligence information. That procedure is that it is held in confidence. We can hold a closed session and the entire Senate assembled can discuss it.

As I understand it, the Senate, as a body, can make the decision to release such intelligence material publicly and openly, if it chooses to do so after it has had a chance to evaluate the dangers of compromising of intelligence sources or the endangering of people's lives who are involved in the intelligence gathering.

I recognize that the procedure limits us, but it is, acting responsibly. We are therefore trying to proceed in the regular course in this regard.

Mr. DOLE. Let me say that I certainly have no quarrel with the distinguished Senator from Maryland. I guess I did not fully understand the impact of Senate Resolution 400 until I testified before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and released a cable that was marked "Classified." I understand Senate Resolution 400 better now.

But I did not mean to infer that Mr. Bensinger, who is the Director of DEA, was not forthcoming. I think he has been as forthcoming as he could be under the circumstances. I did say in my statement that he indicated some frustration in his most recent letter, which is a part of the record. But certainly, he is under some restraint himself.

My only point is that he came to my office some weeks ago and indicated a willingness to cooperate. I was later told that, at the direction of the leadership, all the files were turned over to the Intelligence Committee. I knew at that time that if I walked into the Intelligence Committee, it was over. I do not know the last source that sent me information.

I might add, too, that I have not published any of the information. I have not put it in the Congressional Record. I have not revealed what is in the documents that I have. I have not done that. I know other people have the documents. I have no quarrel with the procedure outlined by the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh), chairman of the Committee on Intelligence, is now in the Chamber. He has heard the debate over his radio, so he knows what it is all about.

I am prepared to renew my unanimous-consent request that on Tuesday, February 21, at the hour of 10 a.m., the Senate resolve itself into a closed session for the purpose of hearing and discussing whatever information the Intelligence Committee has available in connection with the drug issue and—

Mr. DOLE. And anything else.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And intelligence intercepts, in an effort to dispose of these allegations once and for all and get them behind us.

Mr. BAYH. I hate to interrupt the unanimous-consent request, because I think it is a good one and I am prepared not only to support it, but join with the Senator in it as an important increment of our discussion of the matter before us.

As we know, we all have things to do, and I was listening to the debate in my office as I was trying to do some other things. Inasmuch as there may be some citizens out there also listening, perhaps before we deal with the unanimous-consent request, the Senator from Indiana, and perhaps the Senator from Arizona, or anybody else, ought to put this whole thing in proper perspective.

In light of everything that has gone on here, I do not want anybody to get the idea that there is any coverup to be involved here at all.

Would the Senator feel it is appropriate for me to maybe deal with that?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator. It is appropriate and I wish the Senator would do so for that purpose.

I think I will withhold my request.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Kansas will not lose his right to the floor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No.

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BAYH. I think the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Indiana are trying to accomplish the same thing, as far as disclosure, and saying my concern was about possible interpretations of a coverup does not go to the manner nor the substance of the Senator from Kansas presentation. But it goes to the fact that there are a lot of people out there listening that are just hearing this for the first time and do not understand all the substance behind it.

I think it is important for us to reach them as well as to remind ourselves what is involved here.

I see the distinguished Senator from Idaho here who chaired that Select Committee on Intelligence which conducted the investigations that brought out many of the shortcomings of the intelligence agencies. The Senator from Hawaii, Mr. Inouye, and the Senator from Arizona, Mr. Goldwater, then were chosen as chairman and vice chairman of the select committee, which was the first time the Senate had a committee fully empowered to deal with oversight, the drafting of charters, and authorizing their budgets. We have been working diligently.

The Senator from Indiana now finds himself in the role of chairman, ably supported by his friend and colleague from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater), as the ranking Republican.

I think I can speak for the Senator from Arizona because I know his feelings. He is here and he may want to amend or extend what I say now.

But what we are talking about here right now are intelligence questions—the reason the request has been made, and the Senator from Indiana supports that request.

Since the Select Committee on Intelligence was formed, we have had very forthright relations with our intelligence agencies. They have given us the necessary information, and I salute them for that, because if we as a body are to perform the oversight function, if our committee is to perform an oversight function, we must continue to have this kind of relationship where they will tell us everything with the understanding that we are, as loyal Americans and as Senators who have made an oath, not to divulge what will damage our country.

As one Senator who believes in free speech, who has been out there fighting to try to guarantee the rights of Americans protected under the Bill of Rights, I find myself in a rather difficult position. We must see that there is a balance between protection of fundamental constitutional rights and also give our intelligence agencies the tools they need to do the job to provide intelligence and to protect us against our adversaries who would take away our cherished liberties.

We are not living in an easy world. This is not a milk and honey, Sunday school world. We just read in other papers that the KGB was trying to subvert our neighbor to the north, the KGB had 9, 10, or 11 in Canada. We have to bet there are a lot more than that in the United States trying to do the kinds of things most Americans realize are going on. Our intelligence agencies are doing a good job to protect our country from this kind of attack.

But, by the same token, our system is different from any others. We require that our intelligence agencies conduct their intelligence function and, at the same time, abide by the rules of law and not transgress the rights of individual Americans.

That is the balance that brings us here.

We were shocked—we were shocked—to investigate two problem areas. We were asked to look into certain facts, certain occasions, certain individuals, involving events over the last several years.

We are not talking about events which occurred only yesterday or this last year. We are talking about a time period that goes back to the 1960's.

There is no politics in this. We are all trying to find out what the facts are about matters that have gone on over a rather extended period of time.

We were asked to investigate these matters, and we did. We, as the Intelligence Committee, were not asked, nor should we have been asked, to make a judgment on the rightness or wrongness of the Panama Canal Treaty. That, quite rightly, lies within the province of the Foreign Relations Committee.

But we were asked to investigate whether these two sets of circumstances had any impact on the negotiation process, or the terms of the treaty.

In other words, did these two problem areas put our negotiators in a position where they could be forced or coerced, or were we in a position to force or coerce the Panamanians, so that it really was not an equal negotiating session.

I can say without breaching, without breaching any confidence, that our study on both areas led us to conclude that the two problems did not influence the negotiating process.

Now, having concluded that, one could still be either for or against the Panama Canal Treaty. But to repeat, the committee did not find evidence that these two problems created an environment which undermined the negotiating process.

I think it is important, and I feel what the Senator from Kansas is after and has every right to request the right to reverse the report. The committee's report is as forthcoming and a full discussion of this matter. We presented it in the Foreign Relations Committee the other day in the private session. The committee reached the conclusion that the evidence shows that these events did not influence the negotiation process. I think it is perfectly within the right of every Senator to want to make a judgment on his own. The assessment of the Intelligence Committee is based on information which may not now be in the possession of all Members of the Senate.

The committee has all of this information. The report has been made in detail to the Foreign Relations Committee. It is now available under the terms of Senate Resolution 400 for any Senator who wants to see it. There has been no effort to try to hide this. In fact, the Senator from Kansas knows that the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Arizona has made an effort to complete the investigation of one of these two issues and it has not yet been completed. We think we have enough information to answer the key question, but we are still pursuing some leads. When we heard that the Senator from Kansas had information available to him in this regard, we asked him to give it to us. I am sure he will. We do not now have it. We have not received this information from him as yet, and we are certainly prepared to evaluate that information and to make that a part of the report.

First, let me point out that any Senator who wants to get this information can get it now. Under Senate Resolution 400 they cannot divulge these secrets which could damage our country, but the information is fully available to any Senator.

In addition, I have no hesitancy in having a secret session, an executive session, in which we have a full discussion. The Senator from Arizona is prepared and I am prepared to deal with these facts and explain how we reached the conclusions we reached. I think the Senate as a whole has a right to examine our judgment on this and then make its own conclusion.

But I think I heard the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from New York, say as I recall hearing them in my office on the radio, that they concluded that we are talking about two different things here. The Senate now is involved in considering the merits of a treaty. Is it a good treaty or is it a bad treaty? I think it is important, as we listen to this debate on intelligence information, that we keep our eye on whether this treaty is good or bad for the United States. I assume that most Senators will do that, and not judge whether the treaty is good or bad because there may be a few unscrupulous characters involved.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYH. The Senator from Kansas has been very considerate to let me use his time.

Mr. DOLE. I say at this point that I think the American people would be somewhat troubled by our ratifying any document if in fact some of the allegations are true and if someone profited, particularly someone who is in a position of leadership, from international drug traffic.

I do not suppose that should be the determining factor, but I think we should crank it into whatever we have going, the computer, to try to make a decision.

I applaud the Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. Goldwater) for their efforts to try to focus on it and to sort of strain the information and make that determination.

Come next Tuesday, I hope we can get information on these 45 specific files that at least allegedly bear on General Torrijos and profits from drug operations. If this information is available and we have a full discussion on the floor and, as the Senator from Kansas has said, if we are satisfied that did not impact on the treaties, that will settle that portion of it.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BAYH. The Senator from Kansas was not in the Foreign Relations Committee. With great sensitivity, he removed himself, despite our assurances that he was welcome. I think the reasons for his leaving the committee room already have been discussed, and I salute him for those reasons. However, the whole purpose of the Intelligence Committee's investigation was to deal with all those allegations. Some of the allegations are well-founded.

We read some of this stuff in the newspapers, and some of it is true and some of it is false. We tried to ferret out the facts. We tried to find out whether the allegations came from people who had an ax to grind with the people they were criticizing, or whether it was an objective source. We did our best to do this.

Can the Senator from Kansas inform the Senator from Indiana when it will be possible for us to have this information that he has? I would hate us to have made the conclusions we have made and then find information that the Senator has available that we have not had a chance to look at yet.

Mr. DOLE. I have it with me, and someone has suggested that I rush over and hand it to you. But I think it would be better if I delivered it to the appropriate committee this afternoon.

Mr. BAYH. There is no rush. I hope the Senator from Kansas understands that we are doing this in a good faith effort. If anybody has any facts, we will look at them. If anybody has any allegations, we will look at them. I think we all have been involved in the political process long enough to know that, whether it is in the United States or Panama or Timbuktu, allegations are not necessarily true.

What we have tried to do and what I would like to do with the Senator from Kansas is to look at those allegations and see whether there is anything new that has not been considered, and try to find out where it came from and how credible it is.

Mr. DOLE. We will have that information to the Senator this afternoon.

Mr. BAYH. I thank the Senator.

CLOSED SESSION ON TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I now renew my unanimous-consent request that on Tuesday, February 21, at 10 a.m., the Senate go into closed session to consider the issues that have been discussed here today and which may have a peripheral significance with respect to the treaties but, in any event, which should be discussed and put behind us once and for all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator will yield further, I ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. Bayh, and the distinguished minority leader, Mr. Baker, who is an ex-officio member of the Intelligence Committee, as am I, if it is agreeable that on Monday, February 20, beginning at 9 a.m. and extending throughout the day until 5 p.m., the staff of the committee be made available in room S-407 of the Capitol—which is a secure room, with secure telephones—for the purpose of informing any Senators who wish to make themselves available during that day of any information that may be pertinent and which might be helpful to them in the closed session discussion which will occur the following day.

Mr. BAYH. Any Member who wants to correct me may do so, but I think the restrictions of Senate Resolution 400 prohibit us from doing exactly what the Senator from West Virginia has requested. He said "staff," and we do not know what staff is going to be there.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I think that what the majority leader and I discussed—and as I understood the majority leader's request—was that the staff of the Intelligence Committee—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. (continuing). Be in a position to brief Members. Members have the right, under Senate Resolution 400, to be briefed.

Mr. BAYH. Any Member can go over there now, today. He does not have to wait until the 21st. He can read everything. He does not just have to be briefed.

If the Senator's request was that the Intelligence Committee staff be prepared to brief any Senator who wants to be briefed, I salute him for that. That is a good idea.

In addition, when we have the executive session the following day, all of us will be here to participate and try to answer any questions that may not have been answered.

As I recall hearing on the radio a moment ago, it has already been mentioned that the Senator from Arizona and I have requested of the top people in the CIA and the NSA and the Attorney General that they embark immediately, as of the day before yesterday, upon trying to sanitize this, so that we can get all these facts out that do not jeopardize the country, so that we can look at this and the public generally can look at this.

I hate this business of saying that there is something that should not be disclosed. I think we have a burden to everybody, those listening and those not listening, to give the information we have to the country, and we have already attempted to do that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is it to be understood by all Senators that the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee of the Senate will be willing to make available, in room S-407, on Monday, February 20, the staff of the Intelligence Committee, for the purpose of briefing Senators from the hour of 9 a.m. to the hour of 5 p.m.?

Mr. BAYH. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank all Senators, and I thank especially the Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) and the chairman of the Intelligence Committee (Mr. Bayh).

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not think the Chair ruled.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Did the Chair rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the Chair has ordered that to be printed in the Record and made available to all Senators.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole) has the floor.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas permit me to add one other factor or reiterate one other factor?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BAYH. I just want to make certain that everyone knows what is available. The decision has been made that as of Monday morning, the 20th, the Intelligence Committee staff will be there on hand to brief any Senator who wants to be briefed. We then will have the executive session. I have just discussed this with Mr. Miller, the chief of staff of our committee. If any Senator between now—you do not need to wait a week and a half—wants to look at it next Monday instead of a week from next Monday, and wishes to go through all this information, if he will just let us know, and I am sure the Senator from Arizona has no reservations about that. We want to make everything available. I am sure we can do this without hurting the country or violating the responsibility we have as members of the Intelligence Committee through the provisions of Senate Resolution 400.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished chairman of that committee.

I would hope that by, say, Monday, the 20th, we might have the sanitized report that the Intelligence Committee is making available. That will be very helpful, too, if we had that information. Maybe it is not possible, but it would be helpful.

Mr. BAYH. I would say, if the Senator will yield again—I hate to keep interrupting here—we hope by the middle of next week to have that sanitized version which I assume will give a pretty good feel for what the problem is. There are some elements not central to the main arguments that cannot be disclosed because that is sources and methods information which could damage our country and might lead to the loss of the lives of some people who were involved in the collection process.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished majority and minority leaders for their total cooperation.

I say again I think the American people—after all, we are, in effect, talking to the American people, the American people are listening; they want to be informed about the Panama Canal treaties. If I am any judge, they also want to be informed about anything else, whether it relates directly or indirectly to negotiations.

We have had a great deal of mail on this issue, and I would hope that it can now be laid to rest, if laid to rest, or made public, or somehow explored so we can find out just what the true facts are.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me a moment, I would like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the Senator from Kansas. I think he has identified a very, very important issue. I think beyond that it is even more important that the Senate and, indeed, the country, have access to all material and pertinent facts that are available to us from whatever source. I think his suggestion here, and the action that has been taken on the request of the majority leader in which I was happy to concur, has moved us further toward the point where we can make sure that we are all singing off the same sheet of music.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for his effort in that respect.

Mr. DOLE. I totally agree with my distinguished leader, and it seems to me that this could resolve many of the questions some of us have, maybe not completely, but I think we are talking about support of the American people. I am not certain—I assume the secret session will not be on the radio; is that correct?

Mr. BAKER. I would assume so.

Mr. DOLE. That would be a good day for commercials.

Mr. BAKER. We have to make other provisions. It may be no one is listening anyway.

Mr. DOLE. This may be secret enough.

But in any event, I thank the leaders, and I would hope that we can address these questions because they are real. If you look at the mail and read the mail coming from the people, they are asking the questions and we put these questions to General Torrijos, I might add, and he said, "Your agencies are not telling you the truth; I will send you the information."

We waited for a couple of weeks and then we wrote General Torrijos a letter and knowing the system does not work too rapidly, it has been now 3 weeks and we still have not had a response from General Torrijos. But he seemed totally forthcoming as far as our having information.

So I think now we will have the information. Maybe we will not be able to tell anybody about it. But we can say it in our own minds when we are asked to vote.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield the floor. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah for an unanimous-consent request.

(At this point there was a colloquy concerning certain correspondence from a Representative, which by unanimous consent is printed in the Record following Mr. Dole's remarks.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole).

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Kansas will soon conclude. I want to express my appreciation to the majority leader and the minority leader for scheduling the closed session of the Senate on February 21, commencing at 10 a.m., at which time we will discuss some of the allegations with reference to General Torrijos and the Torrijos family, and, hopefully, go through some of the 45 files, or at least have questions with reference to 45 files, which have been indicated to me previously might somehow impact on drug traffic.

Mr. President, finally, it seems to me that if we dispose of the drug matters and start on amendments, we should also consider, before getting into any specific amendment, what happened to the process in the past 12 or 13 months with reference to treaty provisions which were under negotiation prior to 1977.

The Senator from Kansas has just indicated that I have information, I think accurate information, from a reliable source which would indicate that a number of changes were made in the treaties in July and August and May and June of 1977 which I think were not in the best interests of our country. We will be discussing these at greater length line by line, amendment by amendment, article by article, because they bear upon one or two of the amendments the Senator from Kansas will be offering at some later date, in February, March, or April, as we get into a discussion of the treaties. I yield the floor.

(The following proceedings occurred during Mr. Dole's remarks and are printed at this point in the Record by unanimous consent.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I also would like to thank the Senator from Kansas for the great service he has done. I have followed much of this investigation and much of the matters that he has brought up to the extent that I have been able to do so. I think they are of great moment and of great purpose. But at this particular time I would just like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that one of our distinguished colleagues from the House has just brought some, I think, important papers to me.

I would like to just say that this colleague's name is Congressman George Hansen from the Second District of Idaho. Congressman Hansen has been very active of late doing everything he possibly can to justify and to bring about a means whereby the House of Representatives will not be ignored with regard to the Panama Canal treaties, and that the article IV, section 3, clause 2 sections of the Constitution likewise will not be ignored.

Congressman Hansen has put a great deal of time and effort into talking with his colleagues in the House, and he has brought over a list of 219 Members of the House who are basically subscribers or cosponsors of his resolution which states:

That is is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the Zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress.

Two hundred and nineteen of his House Members have cosponsored this resolution in a series of resolutions in the House, which is more than half of the Members of the House who would like to have the opportunity and privilege of representing their constituencies in voting by majority vote whether or not to have these treaties.

Incidentally, I think Congressman Hansen has done the Senate and the complete Congress, one of the three co-equal branches of Government, a great service in pointing out that the House really should have this opportunity and that our colleagues in the Senate should certainly support the House in its demand for this opportunity.

Congressman Hansen has indicated to me that some of these cosponsors of this resolution are not in favor of the treaties and some of them are, but all of them are in favor of having the House vote on this matter because it is the prerogative of the House to vote.

He has also brought to me two letters, one written to our own distinguished colleague and friend Senator Robert C. Byrd, the majority leader, and a letter to the Honorable Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I would just quote from one aspect of the letter to Speaker O'Neill.

Congressman Hansen states in his letter to Speaker O'Neill.

You will note that the concept of the Resolution is to protect the integrity of the legislative process against default or Executive usurpation, a matter of serious concern for many years. It properly conditions treaty approval where property transfer or appropriations are involved to appropriate and timely acts of Congress rather than hit and miss implementation by the Executive occasionally augmented by post-mortem patchwork authorization and appropriation measures.

The Senate is, of course, jealous of its prerogatives, but so should the House be in order to preserve the balance intended by the Constitution. I am hopeful that you were misquoted by the February 4, 1978, Idaho Statesman newspaper in an article which stated:

"But House Speaker Tip O'Neill said he would keep the resolution from reaching the House floor until after the Senate votes on ratification of the treaties, at which time President Carter would probably ignore House claims to jurisdiction."

I am sure that the Idaho Statesman must have had some misinformation there myself because I cannot imagine the Speaker of the House of Representatives in any way even attempting to prohibit the Members of the House during this particularly important debate from voting on this particularly important resolution which really includes 219 cosponsors.

Furthermore, toward the end of the letter to Speaker O'Neill, Congressman Hansen states:

Mr. Speaker, the co-sponsors of the Resolution took their position in the face of controversy and pressure for a principle. They represent both sides of the Treaty issue but feel strongly about timely House involvement according to the Constitution, according to established precedent, and according to responsible and practical application of government procedures through reasonable legislative partnership.

Little can be added or subtracted. The House in a sense has already voted, through the device of co-sponsorship, that no implementation of the Panama treaties should take place without proper House involvement through an Act of Congress. The Resolution is now to be introduced into the Senate and that body could cooperate by its passage or by approving proper reservations or Amendments to any Treaty approvals.

I ask unanimous consent that the two letters, the one to Senator Robert C. Byrd and the one to Speaker O'Neill, and the list of cosponsors of the various concurrent resolutions or resolutions in the House of Representatives, and particularly the list by States, which shows that 124 members of the Republican Party and 95 members of the Democratic Party, representing 46 States, are cosponsors of this resolution, be printed in the Record.

In addition, I think it is fair to note that in the letters Congressman Hansen of Idaho has made it clear that his letter is a bipartisan action. Among the hundreds of sponsors—actually 219 House Members—are the chairmen or chairmen-to-be of the House Appropriations Committee, the Armed Services Committee, the International Relations Committee, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, the Science and Technology Committee, and the Veterans' Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives.

He has also pointed out that the resolution is cosponsored by all the House Members from West Virginia, Alabama, and Idaho, which are States representing the Senate majority leadership position in the Panama issue—I think something that is very notable, and something that we should take cognizance of.

I ask unanimous consent that all of this be printed in the Record at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, what is it the Senator wishes to put in the Record?

Mr. HATCH. I want the two letters to the distinguished majority leader of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the list of the cosponsors to the various concurrent resolutions, and the last page of this, which is a State tally of the Republicans and the Democrats and the total, put into the Record at this point, and I respectfully ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I will certainly not object to the inclusion in the Record of these matters. I cannot remember a time when there was such an objection. But I reserve the right to object simply because this matter being inserted in the Record appears to be a letter addressed to me, in part. Am I correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is true. It is a letter, I think, of such import that it is not private. I think basically this is a letter which expresses Congressman Hansen's extensive and laborious efforts to try to convince not only his colleagues in the House, but every Member of the Senate, including the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of what?

Mr. HATCH. That the House should have the privilege of voting on this matter in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. On what matter?

Mr. HATCH. On the matter of the Panama Canal Treaty, in accordance with the constitutional provisions of article IV, section 3, clause 2.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection to the material going into the Record, but may I say I gave Mr. Hansen my reaction when he delivered the letter to me a few minutes ago.

Mr. HATCH. I would be interested in that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. For the Record, my answer was that under the Constitution the Senate has the sole prerogative and responsibility to give its approval to the ratification of a treaty, No. 1; and, No. 2, property transfers can be self-executing by treaties that are approved by the Senate. Such property transfers have heretofore, in the past, been made by treaties, which in themselves were self-executing as to the transfer of such property. This will not be setting a precedent. Any transfer of properties that may be involved in the Panama Canal treaties will be self-executed by the treaty ratification. That provision will be self-executing at such time as the Senate gives its approval and the President ratifies the treaties, and the exchange of ratification documents takes place between the two countries.

So that was and is my answer to Mr. Hansen. I have no objection to the letters going into the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President—

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, reserving my right to the floor, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Kansas has the right to the floor, but I just want to make one further request: That this colloquy follow the discussion of the Senator from Kansas and other Senators concerning allegations concerning drug traffic, and the agreement on the secret session.

Mr. HATCH. I certainly agree.

Mr. DOLE. Then, if the Senator would like, I can finish my remarks and yield the floor, because I only have about 1 more minute.

Mr. HATCH. Well, I certainly apologize. I thought the Senator had finished. If I may just add one more sentence—

Mr. DOLE. Fine.

Mr. HATCH. It is this: Let the Record show that as much as I admire the distinguished majority leader, I respectfully disagree on his interpretation of the Constitution, on his interpretation of the law, and on his interpretation that this is a self-executing set of treaties. I think the law would bear out that that is not correct, and I think many of my colleagues in both the House and the Senate would argue very strongly that that is incorrect, along with many legal authorities in this country.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will be glad to discuss this matter at any length the able Senator from Utah wishes to discuss it. His saying that he rejects my argument does not make the argument invalid. My argument stands. Mr. Hansen, who is now in the Chamber, received my answer orally when he submitted his letter to me, and he has just heard me restate my position for the record in response to the request made by the Senator from Utah to put the letter addressed to me in the Record. I am very happy to have the letter go into the Record; I will be very happy to answer the letter to Mr. Hansen now, as I did a few minutes ago, and I am very happy to say that I think my answer, most respectfully, is a proper one.

I respect Mr. Hansen, a Member of the House for his interest and for his writing the letter to me. I find no fault with that at all. What I have said is not meant in any way to be any criticism of him or the Members of the House who cosigned the request or the resolution, or whatever it may have been.

But I must state without any equivocation exactly where I stand on this issue. I have done that, and I am content to let the matter rest at that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a request before this body for a unanimous consent to have printed in the Record certain documents which, together with the remarks pertinent thereto, will follow the remarks of the Senator from Kansas (Mr. Dole). Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not, although I am probably inclined to, because I think we are seeing demonstrated here the power of the broadcast media: this is probably one of several grandstand efforts that we will see, not only, maybe, from our own 100 Members that we have here, but maybe from the other side of the Capitol also. We are being asked to consider something extraneous to the principal issue before us, and that is whether or not to ratify these treaties.

I know there is a legal question as to whether or not the House of Representatives should be involved in voting on the disposition of American property. But it is just that; it is a legal question. The proper place to have it resolved, of course, is in the courts. An effort has been made, as I understand, to do that.

The majority leader has expressed what many legal scholars believe to be the correct interpretation of the constitutional requirement. The interpretations which I have read have ranged all the way from saying yes, the House must participate, to they should not, or they do not necessarily have to.

The constitutional requirement does not say, according to some legal scholars, that the House has that exclusive jurisdiction and authority; that the President may, or he may through treaties, dispose of property.

So it is a legal question. We can argue it here all year and never come to a solution. It ought to be resolved in the proper place. Whatever the courts decide is whatever the Congress will have to do.

We should not get this debate, in my judgment, bogged down in these kinds of extraneous issues which have virtually no bearing upon the merits of the treaties upon which we are called upon to make a decision.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Before the Senator yields the floor, will the Senator agree with me that the other body does have a responsibility equal to the responsibility of the Senate in the enactment of implementing legislation which may be made necessary by the ratification of the treaty? We do not deny that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There is no question about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1978.

HON. ROBERT C. BYRD,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: I am writing to officially advise you of a concurrent resolution concerning the Panama Canal issue which I introduced into the House of Representatives shortly after the Treaty signing in September 1977.

This Resolution, H. Con. Res. 347, has a huge number of co-sponsors, a majority of House Members, which indicates overwhelming support for upholding the constitutional prerogatives of both Houses of Congress under Article IV.

The Resolution in no way interferes with the Article II powers of Treaty approval held by the Senate but insists that such authority be properly teamed with Article IV to prevent the House being held hostage to Senate action.

This is entirely consistent in terms of good legislative relations between two co-equal bodies representing the same constituency with somewhat differing responsibilities, neither of which should be considered of lesser importance, particularly on an issue so critical to the nation's interests.

The teaming of Articles II and IV is also consistent with all precedent involving Panama and the many past Treaty revisions.

My Resolution states "... that it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the Zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress."

You will note that the concept of the Resolution is to protect the integrity of the legislative process against default or Executive usurpation, a matter of serious concern for many years. It properly conditions treaty approval where property transfer or appropriations are involved to appropriate and timely acts of Congress rather than hit and miss implementation by the Executive occasionally augmented by post-mortem patchwork authorization and appropriation measures.

Just as the Senate is jealous of its authority and prerogatives, so is the House, and rightly so, to preserve the balance intended by the Constitution. Therefore, we are saying to you, we in the U.S. House of Representatives in the name of the citizens of this nation insist on fair play and responsible procedure. We cannot abide by the following process as outlined in the Federal 4, 1978 Idaho Statesman, "But House Speaker Tip O'Neill said he would keep the resolution from reaching the House floor until after the Senate votes on ratification of the treaties, at which time President Carter would probably ignore House claims to jurisdiction."

Hopefully a Speaker of the House, party politics aside, would not really be so cavalier regarding the prerogatives of that great body and its responsibilities to the people. Hopefully the Majority Leader of the Senate and others in positions of power will have proper respect for legislative partnership and processes.

I can assure you that my Resolution indicates little support for forfeiture of House responsibilities. In fact, you will note of the hundreds of co-sponsors that there is strong representation among Chairman and ranking minority Members of all major committees and sub-committees concerned with the Panama issue. This includes the Chairman (or Chairman-designate for the next Congress) of Appropriations, Armed Services, International Relations, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Science and Technology, and Veterans Affairs.

Also, it is probably well to inform you that my Resolution is cosponsored by all House Members from West Virginia, Alabama, and Idaho which are the States representing the Senate Majority Leadership in the Panama issue (Majority Leader and Foreign Relations Chairman and Chairman-apparent).

Hopefully you will understand the seriousness of the Panama matter to Members of the House so that legislation is properly framed to prevent constitutional and legislative confrontation which could impair relations and even preclude the will of Congress as agents for the people by unnecessarily causing the decisions to be made in the Courts.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 10, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives,
Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.,

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This letter is to respectfully and officially inform you of my Concurrent Resolution concerning the Panama Canal issue which was first introduced as final Treaty negotiations were in process.

This Resolution, H. Con. Res. 347, has by survey overwhelming support in the House and this is further attested by the fact that a majority of House Members are now cosponsors and this list is growing.

The Resolution appears to be most necessary to establish order and prevent misunderstanding. To allow Senate Treaty action without timely conditional House action as our authority applies is to leave a major international decision to twist in the wind of hit and miss enabling action that could cause more pain than any treaty approval could hope to relieve.

The House would be acting with a gun to its head operating in a climate of fait accompli and have little opportunity to freely work its will. I can't believe any responsible House Member would want to face such a situation.

I realize some Members feel this matter is solely a Senate prerogative and others would like to avoid the issue. I also understand the Administration's position of wishing to involve the House only on occasion and after the fact for certain implementation programs.

However, the transfer of U.S. assets is so major and so unprecedented that to preclude the House in the finalizing considerations appears to be a gross neglect of both Congressional rights and responsibilities. The Senate debates and hearings in both bodies have clearly identified a total transfer impact on taxpayers of hundreds of millions of dollars in addition to the billions invested in the land and improvements. Surely, the House cannot sidestep its tax and appropriation responsibilities as a condition of final action on the Treaty proposals.

The assured heavy increase in tolls and tariffs (estimated by U.S. State Department Environmental Impact Statement to be 40-60%) promises to raise the price of food, heating oil and most major commodities for every consumer in the United States. This increase of transit fees at the crucial Panama junction can also have significant adverse impact on our already disastrous balance of payments situation by further impairing our ability to compete in the world market.

Midwest farmers depending heavily for customers in the Far East would have the Panama middle-man to pay which could seriously damage their ability to sell in competition with Canada, Argentina, Australia and New Zealand when a cent per bushel or per pound can mean the difference in the grain and cattle markets.

Millions of metric tons of sugar from the West Coast including my State of Idaho comes through the Canal to the East Coast in competition with Latin American producers who already have so undercut the U.S. farmers' market that an agriculture depression exists in rural America. Those farmers we have with us today aren't in Washington to enjoy the scenery, I can assure you.

And, after the vicious rise in heating oil and gasoline prices during recent years because of the Arab boycott and other factors, how can we subject the citizens of the whole Eastern part of the U.S., including your own State of Massachusetts, to higher costs by paying a surcharge to Panama for the new domestic oil available from Alaska's north slopes without House scrutiny?

By land, by sea, by air this Nation has been commercially and militarily united in recent years so that no traffic need cross foreign soil to traverse from coast to coast conveniently and economically. Will we place a foreign nation's toll booth astraddle of our sea lane without timely House scrutiny?

The point I make, Mr. Speaker, is that the proposed Panama Canal Treaties have major economic impact upon the farmers, consumers and taxpayers of the Nation and as their elected representatives we can not ignore their well-being as is our responsibility under the Constitution.

The Library of Congress Research Service, American Law Division report of August 4, 1977, by legislative attorney Kenneth Merin notes:

"The United States has transferred territory and property in and around the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama on four previous occasions.

"The 1932 and 1937 transfers were effected by Act of Congress. In 1943, a Joint Resolution approved an executive agreement calling for the transfer of property to Panama. Three provisions in a 1955 treaty with Panama provided for the disposition of territory and property. One of those provisions required implementing legislation. Although the other two provisions did not call for implementing legislation, a State Department official acknowledged that implementing legislation would be required for all three provisions."

The Study concludes that,

"It is clear that Congress has often asserted an exclusive right to dispose of federal territory and property. It is also apparent that both the Executive and the Senate have recognized that claim in past dispositions of property in the Canal Zone to Panama."

The Study continues regarding Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 that,

"... it appears that those powers have been recognized as exclusive for purposes of disposal of property in and around the Canal Zone to Panama."

Also noted by the Study was the following:

"Finally, regardless of the nature of the Article IV power, the co-operation of all three branches of government is necessary for the effective implementation of American foreign policy. Although the President is the sole organ of communications with other nations, conclusion of a treaty without prior regard for congressional attitudes might adversely affect the continuing executive/congressional relationship."

The Resolution in no way interferes with the Article II powers of Treaty approval held by the Senate but insists that such authority be properly teamed with Article IV to prevent the House being held hostage to Senate action.

I believe this is entirely consistent in terms of good legislative relations between two co-equal bodies representing the same constituency with somewhat differing responsibilities, neither of which should be considered of lesser importance, particularly on an issue so critical to the Nation's interests.

The teaming of Article II and IV is consistent with all precedent involving Panama and the many past Treaty revisions.

My Resolution states "... That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the Zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress."

You will note that the concept of the Resolution is to protect the integrity of the legislative process against default or Executive usurpation, a matter of serious concern for many years. It properly conditions treaty approval where property transfer or appropriations are involved to appropriate and timely acts of Congress rather than hit and miss implementation by the Executive occasionally augmented by post-mortem patchwork authorization and appropriation measures.

The Senate is, of course, jealous of its prerogatives, but so should the House be in order to preserve the balance intended by the Constitution. I am hopeful that you were misquoted by the February 4, 1978, Idaho Statesman newspaper in an article which stated,

"But House Speaker Tip O'Neill said he would keep the resolution from reaching the House floor until after the Senate votes on ratification of the treaties, at which time President Carter would probably ignore House claims to jurisdiction."

My Resolution indicates little support for forfeiture of House responsibilities. In fact, of the hundreds of co-sponsors there is strong representation among Chairmen and Ranking Minority Members of all major committees and subcommittees concerned with the Panama issue. This includes the Chairman (or Chairman-designate for the next Congress) of Appropriations, Armed Services, International Relations, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Science and Technology, and Veterans Affairs.

Also, my Resolution is co-sponsored by all House Members from a number of states including West Virginia, Alabama and Idaho which are the homes of the Senate Majority leadership in the Panama issue (Majority Leader and Foreign Relations Chairman and Chairman-apparent).

Mr. Speaker, the co-sponsors of the Resolution took their position in the face of controversy and pressure for a principle. They represent both sides of the Treaty issues but feel strongly about timely House involvement according to the Constitution, according to established precedent, and according to responsible and practical application of government procedures through reasonable legislative partnership.

Little can be added or subtracted. The House in a sense has already voted, through the device of co-sponsorship, that no implementation of the Panama treaties should take place without proper House involvement through an Act of Congress. The Resolution is now to be introduced into the Senate and that body could cooperate by its passage or by approving proper reservations or Amendments to any Treaty approvals.

I would hope that my efforts have given you the foundation to call for timely and appropriate House involvement in advance of any final determination regarding the issue of possession of the Panama Canal Zone and American installations there.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN

(This concludes proceeding which occurred earlier.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt) is recognized.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Idaho, with whom I had a personal agreement, I will yield the floor to him at the conclusion of my brief remarks.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has been working off to the side of the main debate on the Panama Canal Treaties. It is a little bit like being exposed to the loneliness of a long distance runner. However, I believe there is a better answer for us and our friends in this hemisphere, a better answer than the treaties which are being offered to the U.S. Senate. That answer is a system of international management and defense of the canal.

Mr. President, the Panama Treaties have provoked more concern, interest, and discussion among the American people than any other foreign policy issue in recent times. If taken together with all other debates about the "path between the seas," there is probably no more greatly contested issue in American history. We find a personal and emotional involvement of the American people in the Panama Canal issue that seems to defy any quantitative explanation. This is truly a domestic issue as well as a foreign policy issue.

In addition to hearing about its role in the lives of our fathers or grandfathers, most Americans have some direct or indirect attachment to "the canal." The feat of building the canal still stands as one of America's great achievements, much like landing on the Moon 60 years later. By the technology which was produced by that feat we have had one of our greatest rejuvenations of the American economy, both domestically and internationally.

Americans are deeply concerned about the foreign policy of this country. The clear perception for many people, and particularly many of our young people with whom I talked, is that recently we have too often backed down to the demands of less than free governments. There is a concern of how other nations view us: A concern of what the future of the world will be if this, the greatest free nation in history, has neither the will nor strength to stand for what we believe is best for all peoples.

Our people are concerned that the long-term interests of the United States are being compromised. While recent polls have indicated that the treaties have picked up some popular support, the majority of Americans and certainly the majority of New Mexicans are still not satisfied with these treaties.

At the same time, my discussions with Latin American ambassadors and experts show that rejection of the treaties is clearly unacceptable nationally to most hemispheric governments. The recent publicity indicates that a majority of the Panamanians approve the treaties although all their motivations are not clear. Outright rejection also would ignore the political realities of radical opposition faced by most Latin American leaders. Most critically, the times are moving against the propriety of the unilateral control of territory or technology of international usefulness, such as an international waterway between oceans.

Although I plan to continue to oppose the treaties before the Senate, I find, Mr. President, that neither a vote for nor a vote against these treaties will satisfy the true situation we face in Panama, in Latin America, or in the world. These treaties fail to address themselves to the future of those countries and of the modern world. Whatever the final vote on the treaties the Panama Canal issue will not go away.

We have seen over and over again that bilateral treaties have not been successful.

That is what we have before us—a set of bilateral treaties, treaties between two nations.

In only takes one party to break such a treaty. In such a situation, the other nations, who are also dependent on the canal, much more so than ourselves, can have no real guarantee of nondiscriminatory rates and unlimited use of the canal.

Nor is there any real guarantee that our Nation can defend the canal with the sanction and without the opposition of Panama or the rest of the hemisphere. Amendments to these bilateral treaties will not basically change the future realities of world opinion should we intervene unilaterally without general approval of such an act. The President's commitment to intervene militarily if trouble arises should the treaties be rejected, was not only premature but ill advised in the absence of the real facts of a real situation.

The only answer to this dilemma before us is the involvement of all nations of this hemisphere in the operation and defense of the canal. This internationally important waterway has become a truly hemispheric resource, beyond the prevue of any one nation. We have a model of this type of international management which has been successful in recent years. I am referring to the Intelsat system of international communications. I suggest that only this type of system, which depends on the direct vested interests of many nations, will be successful in guaranteeing the long-term defense and openness of the canal. It will also guarantee a permanent step toward better hemisphere relations, and better cooperation between the various nations.

There are many analogies between the international utility of the Panama Canal and the international utility of global communication satellites. Foremost among these analogies is a clearly definable international need for continuous and equitable operation in the interest of all nations and all people.

The political and technical management of a global communication satellite system, as manifested by the Intelsat organization, is a unique new entry into the international scene. It is an organization that developed because of a coincidence of new technology and obvious international need. To the everlasting credit of the United States, we perceived this coincidence and guided the gradual trial-and-error development of Intelsat. To the everlasting credit of the Intelsat organization, it has become an example of international cooperation that is not only remarkably successful, but is both utilitarian and profitable.

Since late last summer, I have worked with several individuals who are experts in international institutional arrangements in the development of "Intersea," a proposal for hemispheric management and defense of the Panama Canal. "Intersea" is based on the Intelsat management system but also incorporates modern trends toward regionalism by matching Western Hemisphere control of the canal with international users' participation in decisions affecting use of the canal.

It is my belief that hemispheric management would satisfy the most significant national and economic interests of the United States, the Republic of Panama, all of Latin America, and the user nations of the world. Most importantly, it would bring into the management and defense of the canal those nations with the greatest interest in insuring the successful implementation of that management and defense.

(Mr. Hollings assumed the chair.)

Mr. SCHMITT. While the Senate has not been asked to consider possible alternatives to the proposed treaties, nor do I suspect that it will be by the administration, the situation presents a unique opportunity for this body to step into the future; to guide the hand of the executive branch toward something of higher purpose and utility. My discussions of "Intersea" with Americans and Latin Americans over the last several months have convinced me that the concept of international management is also politically acceptable and in fact would be preferred by a majority of people here and abroad.

The "Intersea" concept is a concept of the space age and of an age of growing awareness of certain common international resources on this spaceship Earth.

We have only to think of the growing interest in the deep sea resources, of the Antarctic resources, of the problem of the disposal of nuclear waste, of the potential of tapping the resources of outer space, to realize that the concept of international management is not only here, but may well be mandatory if we are to move safely into the future.

"Intersea" would provide management of the canal by a regional organization for the benefit of all hemispheric nations. It recognizes the canal as an international resource with the common heritage of all nations. It provides for all users of the canal to have representation in decisions affecting its use, defense and expansion. "Intersea" would be an organization tailored to manage the canal through a sharing of sovereignty rather than unilateral control by any nation.

International management, such as "Intersea," would serve as a viable answer to one of the most complex technical, international, and political questions of our time, the question of the future of the Panama Canal.

As I pointed out earlier, there is a deep concern on the part of the American people about the future of the United States and, in fact, the future of the world. The actions we take here with regard to the Panama Canal are important components of the future makeup of the world. Will the United States remain the strong bastion of freedom that we always have been? The decision we make on these treaties, in part, are related to finding an answer to that question.

Mr. President, a more detailed description of this concept was placed in the Record on January 19, 1978. I hope my colleagues who have not yet studied this material will do so.

Later in the debate on these treaties, I shall propose reservations to the treaties to require that future discussions on major new facilities such as railroads or pipelines or, in fact, a sea-level canal, be conducted with the hemisphere in mind, and that, in fact, those negotiations include representatives of the rest of the hemisphere that are interested.

If, by some chance, a stalemate develops, then we shall consider offering amendments to provide for hemispheric negotiations that may be the necessary compromise to break any such stalemate in the Senate over the treaties related to the Panama Canal.

I yield the floor to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, in the long and heated debate that has occurred thus far over the Panama Canal treaties, both sides have focused almost exclusively on their disagreements. Few participants have noted the extent to which both sides agree—that the present treaty with Panama is outmoded, that a new one is needed, and that its central feature must be to keep the canal open and running smoothly. There are, I think, several reasons underlying this consensus.

First, the present arrangement is 75 years old. When we took over the digging of the canal from the French in 1903, the United States had only recently commenced reaching out any distance from its shores. Traveling to Panama to inspect the excavation, Theodore Roosevelt became the first American President ever to leave the United States while in office. The most effective means of achieving national goals in the year of the Kitty Hawk flight are simply not the same in the era of the space shuttle.

Second, the people of Panama want a new treaty. They have been our staunch friends, as loyal as any of our allies. Their desires are important, and to ignore them on this issue, about which they feel so passionately, would be to destroy that friendship.

Third, we have learned a lot about the nationalist impulse of other people. We have found, through a painful, mistaken war in Southeast Asia, that citizens of small countries feel pride and patriotism just as much as we do. The Canal Zone is virtually the only remaining area in the world in which any country retains the vestiges of extraterritorial rights. What this arrangement means, by way of example, is that a Panamanian arrested in the Canal Zone—perhaps only blocks from his house—will be tried by a foreign court, under a foreign law, in a foreign language. No patriot anywhere has ever willingly accepted such humiliation. Those who fought at Lexington and Concord repudiated the authority of a distant throne, exercised in a form far less severe.

Fourth, in the event force were ever required to uphold the present antiquated arrangement, the United States would stand alone in the community of nations. The evidence is plain. For example, the United Nations Security Council in 1973 considered a resolution condemning the perpetuation of American jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. Not one nation—not even our closest allies—voted for our position, and we were forced to veto the resolution to prevent its passage.

This is not to say that we should permit our national prerogatives to be determined by international bodies. We must define our own interests, and defend them—through multilateral action where possible, through unilateral action where necessary. But it seems generally agreed that, in the case of the Panama Canal, a new, fairer arrangement would strengthen the legal and moral basis for using military power to defend our interests should that ever become necessary.

It is for reasons such as these, I think, that even opponents of the treaties have concluded that some new arrangement is called for. The question at issue, then, is this: Do the treaties, as negotiated and submitted to the Senate, represent a new arrangement that will indeed serve our national interest? What is meant by national interest, of course, is not easily quantified or measured. But I think the commonsense objectives which I have heard expressed, in one form or another, in dozens of conversations in my own State, and in hundreds of letters from my constituents, are as good as any. They come down, I think, to four in number:

First, the United States must continue to enjoy the full use of the canal as an open and neutral passageway.

Second, the canal must be kept militarily secure.

Third, the achievement of these goals must neither weaken the worldwide position of the United States nor strengthen the hand of our adversaries in Latin America.

Fourth, to endure, the new arrangements should be fair and perceived to be fair.

These are sensible standards by which to judge the treaties now before the Senate. They are addressed to the legitimate concerns of our citizens. However, before applying these tests, a short synopsis of the treaties is in order.

Under the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty, the United States will continue to operate the canal until the year 2000 through a U.S. Government agency, to be known as the Panama Canal Commission. The Commission in its operations will be governed by U.S. law, which will extend to such matters as the setting of tolls and employee regulations. Five members of the Commission's nine-member board will be Americans, and even the Panamanian members will have to be approved by our President. During this period, American troops will remain in Panama and the United States will have the primary responsibility for defending the canal.

Beginning in the year 2000, operation of the canal will be transferred to the Panamanians. At present, nearly 75 percent of the canal work force consists of Panamanians; by the year 2000, they will have moved into all levels of management and will be in charge of running the canal. Even then, however, the United States will retain the right to counter any threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of ships through the canal. The Neutrality Treaty also assures that American ships will be able to go through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, and that in an emergency they will be able to go to the head of the line—ahead of other ships waiting to go through the canal. Finally, a protocol to the Neutrality Treaty will be open to accession by all nations, which means, Mr. President, that countries of the world will be given an opportunity to endorse and support the concept of a neutral passageway, open to peaceful commerce of the world, the modus operandi of the canal.

The treaties are, then, addressed to the practical issue of use of the canal. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General George Brown, testified, the treaties "are the best way of preserving our access to and passage through the canal as a matter of national security." Secretary of Defense Brown put it this way:

Use of the canal is more important than ownership. Efficient operation of the canal in the years ahead is more important than nostalgia for a simpler past. Ability to defend and control access to the canal is essential, but the issue is how that ability can best be assured—by cooperative effort with a friendly Panama or by a garrison amid hostile surroundings.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator's argument presupposes we are going to be dealing for the 23-year period and after 2000 with a friendly Panama.

What is the situation, as far as the interest of this country is concerned, if the situation with Panama should deteriorate and they become unfriendly?

Mr. CHURCH. In that event, I say to the Senator that the United States retains the right, if it ever becomes necessary, not only for the balance of this century, but forever after, to take unilateral military action to preserve the canal, to keep it safe and to keep it open.

Mr. LAXALT. All right.

Mr. CHURCH. Now, I expect that ratification of these treaties will be a major step toward guaranteeing that our future relations with the Panamanians would be friendly. But no mortal can positively insure that some unexpected event might not tip them the other way.

Mr. LAXALT. I understand.

Mr. CHURCH. And if that were ever to happen, these treaties would give us the legal right to take unilateral military action to keep the canal safe and open against any threat, whether internal or external.

Mr. LAXALT. But at the present time and continuing up to 2000, it is true, is it not, that we have forces in place, we have complete physical control of the facility. That is true; is it not?

Mr. CHURCH. That is true.

Mr. LAXALT. In the year 2000, it is true also, is it not, we will have absolutely no military presence within the Canal Zone or with the Republic of Panama.

Mr. CHURCH. From the year 2000, American bases will be closed and Panama then undertakes by these treaties not to permit any foreign forces on her soil.

Mr. LAXALT. All right.

Mr. CHURCH. The present arrangements we have with Panama do not contain that prohibition.

Mr. LAXALT. I understand that.

But in the year 2000, if there is a difficulty, and as the Senator said we do not know, we hope not, but if there is a difficulty, either with Panama or with the Soviet Union, at that point we will have absolutely no physical military forces within the zone. I think the Senator concedes that.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. LAXALT. All right.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator is correct. But I may point out to him that as far as other large powers are concerned, we have always relied upon the primacy of the American fleet to protect the canal. We have kept enemy ships far enough away in two World Wars so there could not be any interference with the transit of ships through the canal.

Secretary of Defense Brown told us, in the course of our hearings, that we would not defend the canal by sinking an enemy ship in it. What we would do is use our naval power to keep enemy ships away.

Of course, under these treaties, we retain our capacity to control both the Pacific access and the Atlantic access to the canal, to prevent any threat of that kind from developing in the future.

Mr. LAXALT. I understand.

But let me carry the scenario just a bit further.

It is true we would, I hope, maintain a strong naval presence in the area on either side.

Let us assume that we have difficulty with Panama or with the Soviets, and let us assume that the difficulty does not come from the outlying sea lanes but from within Panama itself, and we need access for security purposes. At that point, we will have no physical forces there. Is it not true that that is going to call literally for an invasion of the Republic of Panama by this country to enforce its rights?

Mr. CHURCH. The term "invasion," I suggest to the Senator, is inappropriate, because these treaties will be amended in such a way as to make it explicit that we reserve a legal right to use unilateral military force if there is any future threat to the canal.

"Invasion" connotes an illegal entry upon the territory of another nation, but in these treaties, if amended, we reserve the legal authority to move in, if necessary, to keep the canal open in the future. Should that ever become necessary, we are far better off to be clothed with the legal right to defend the canal than to have to act without color of right.

Mr. LAXALT. I understand that. But what we are doing here, basically, is trading a right which is very tangible, in place, and we are trading it for a paper legal right.

Let us go back to my problem, which concerns me very seriously, and I suspect it concerns other millions of Americans also.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator's problem is that he wants to keep American forces in Panama forever.

Mr. LAXALT. As long as the security of this country is to be maintained; the Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. CHURCH. Then I suggest to him that he is living 50 years behind his time. There was a time, back when the 1903 treaty was executed, when this world was controlled by half a dozen great powers, when most of the people of the world, living in South America and Africa and Asia, were subjugated to foreign control, enforced by foreign troops. But those days are over. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that all those colonies have disappeared. They are part of a dead past, and in their place are a hundred new independent governments.

Mr. LAXALT. Is the Senator suggesting that Panama is a colony?

Mr. CHURCH. I am suggesting to the Senator from Nevada that the Panama Canal Zone, subjected as it is to American law, American control, and the occupation of American forces, represents in fact, an exercise in extraterritorial rights that has all the characteristics of a colony.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not want to get too much into the point of a colony, because we are going to discuss that thoroughly when we get into article I. However, is it not the essence of a colonial situation that the major power exploit the smaller power in terms of its natural resources? Where has the exploitation been in the situation here, where no country has been more greatly benefited by another than Panama has been benefited by the United States, since 1903?

Mr. CHURCH. I would like very much to answer that question, because, among all the arguments that have been made by the treaties opponents, the one just advanced by the Senator from Nevada annoys me the most. So if the Senator will indulge me, I should like to take a few minutes to answer that argument.

Mr. LAXALT. May I sit down? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, you may sit down. Are you ready? [Laughter.]

A number of Senators have made this point, that we have done the Panamanians so much good they should be appreciative. Why, we have invested billions of dollars in military installations. We maintain a large payroll in the Canal Zone. Even though the better paid may not be Panamanians, still, 75 percent of the employees are Panamanian citizens. And we pay them good money.

Moreover, Americans in the Canal Zone go outside the zone, into Panama, and they buy merchandise in Panamanian stores, and this has had a beneficial impact on the economy. The Panamanians must be a very ungrateful people, we are told, if they do not appreciate how much good we have done them.

As the Senator from Nevada, himself, has pointed out, they are not the poorest people in the hemisphere. They are relatively better off than many other Latin Americans, at least in part by virtue of our investment and our payroll. So why should they not like us? Why should they not want us to remain indefinitely, with our laws, with our police, with our military forces, in this Canal Zone which bisects that little country, even though any Panamanian who might be caught speeding in the Canal Zone, or with a broken taillight, or for some other infraction of our regulations would be subject to our arrest, to our jurisdiction, and would be tied in our courts, in our language——

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator is not apologizing for that?

Mr. CHURCH. I am saying to the Senator, imagine, if you will, such an arrangement in our country. Suppose there was a strip of land 10 miles wide and 40 miles long in Nevada, occupied by a foreign power, controlled by foreign military forces, and any Nevadan who went in there was subject to the jurisdiction of that foreign power, could be arrested, could be tried, could be jailed. What would happen in Nevada? Why, the people of Nevada would not wait overnight to take charge and force an end to that humiliation.

Mr. LAXALT. I suggest that the people of my State feel that that is their condition now, since 87 percent of the land is in the Federal Government, which we consider to be a foreign power. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHURCH. Very well. But I believe that the Senator's point only underscores the force of the question I put to him. The Senator knows that the people of Nevada would not permit the imposition of a foreign jurisdiction within their State, and neither would the people of Idaho.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. And neither would the people of any State in the whole of our country.

Why must we live by a double standard? If we would not accept such a condition, why should we expect the Panamanians to accept it, and love us in the bargain?

I say to the Senator that you cannot pay the Panamanians enough to buy their pride. You cannot pay them enough to purchase their patriotism.

When I hear Senators say on this floor, "Yes, we realize that new, better, fairer arrangements should be made, as long as we keep the zone, and the canal; all we have to do is pay them more money," I think to myself, how can they miss the point so completely? How can anyone be so blinded by the double standard as to make an argument such as this?

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. LAXALT. As long as we are dealing in rampant speculation, where would Panama be today if the United States had not gone in there in 1903 and built that canal?

Mr. CHURCH. If the Senator wants me to speculate, I do not think this question is susceptible to a single answer. A French company was still there, digging.

Mr. LAXALT. Bankrupt.

Mr. CHURCH. It was the trustee of a bankrupt operation.

Mr. LAXALT. That is right.

Mr. CHURCH. There were other countries of the world that might well have picked up where the French left off, if the United States had not intervened in Panama.

I am not at all sure, given the fact that the Suez Canal was constructed by a foreign company, that it necessarily follows that no Panama Canal would ever have been built, but for the United States.

The Senator certainly cannot prove such a proposition, nor do those events that preceded our intervention in Panama suggest that a canal might not have been built by some other country.

Mr. LAXALT. But the point that I make, I say to the Senator, is this: I have sat on this floor far too many hours the last 3 days and heard the proponents of this treaty literally apologize to the world for our being in Panama to begin with and literally apologize for what I considered to be a magnificent project and a tremendous contribution to the people of that country.

I, for one, am not going to indulge in any breast-beating here because I have nothing to apologize for. I do not think the vast majority of the American people have anything to apologize for. I think what is past is past and we deal with the situation as we now find it and look to the future.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I could not agree more with Senator Laxalt. He said he will not engage in any breast-beating. But I suggest he is beating a strawman. I have not heard any proponent of the treaty suggest an apology—certainly I have not.

Mr. LAXALT. I heard Senator Gravel yesterday, which almost caused me to cry, about how badly we treated those poor Panamanians.

Mr. CHURCH. I am sure that the Senator was able to keep his composure.

Mr. LAXALT. Barely, for a different reason.

Mr. CHURCH. In any case, I have said nothing. My colleague, Senator Sarbanes from Maryland, who shares the floor with me as a proponent of these treaties, has said nothing to suggest we should feel guilty. The construction of the canal was a wonderful achievement. All Americans took pride in it and rightfully so. At the time, it was the greatest engineering accomplishment in history. And it has been a blessing to the world, an enormous benefit to the world's commerce.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator feel guilty——

Mr. CHURCH. Nobody is apologizing for the Panama Canal or American construction of it.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator feel——

Mr. CHURCH. If I may reply to the Senator, he made a statement and I would like to make my own position clear.

It has been 75 years since 1903. The issues before the Senate now do not relate to the great engineering accomplishment represented by the construction of the canal. We must deal with the question of whether, in 1978, when the colonies of this world have become independent nations when values and practices have changed, it is advisable for the United States to maintain in perpetuity what is, in effect, a colony, an American colony stretching across this little country. That is the issue, and I say we will better protect our interests for the future if we do the right thing by Panama today.

This has nothing to do with besmirching the past because in 1903 the world operated on entirely different standards.

Mr. LAXALT. I might suggest——

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAXALT. May I make one observation, I say to Senator Sarbanes. I agree, the situation has changed dramatically and 1978 is not 1903. This is one of the real concerns I have because the fact is and I am told by reputable people like Admiral Moorer that that canal is a strategic waterway, absolutely essential to the security of the United States and essential to the security of this hemisphere. When I am told by people like this that it is essential that we maintain our position I become concerned. I become concerned, too, because General Torrijos told me personally that he was closely tied with Fidel Castro and, when I find that the President today held meetings in the White House where there is great concern about additional Cuban involvement in Africa, then I say to myself if we surrender this strategic facility, which has enormous security consequences for this country, where in the world are we if we find Fidel Castro operating that facility in league with the Soviets? Is that not a genuine concern, so long as we are dealing with speculation here?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I do not know whether we are dealing with speculation or with some chapter out of Alice in Wonderland.

Mr. LAXALT. There is no chapter in Alice in Wonderful in Africa, to be sure.

Mr. CHURCH. If I follow the Senator's argument, he suggests these treaties will somehow open the door to increased Communist influence in the isthmus.

Just the opposite is the case. If the Senator is interested in the canal and in its security, let me just quote the Secretary of Defense who, when he appeared before the committee, had this to say:

The canal was built for shipping, not slogans. We seek to guarantee transit of vessels, not theoretical claims of title. These goals we have sought, as I said at the beginning, are practical. The issues before you are practical ones. Our negotiations have obtained instruments which, more recently than thousands of forces and their armaments on the spot, will assure those practical objectives for generations to come.

I agree with Secretary Brown, and I will have some more to say on that subject in a moment.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. This is on one point on which the Senator from Nevada made relative to his conversation with General Torrijos.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I was one of those seven Senators who went to Panama last November, headed by Senator Byrd, our majority leader, and when the question was put to General Torrijos, "Is it true, General, that after the treaties are ratified, you will invite either Cuba or Russia to come in to help you operate the canal," the response of General Torrijos was, "I don't want Panamanian waters infested by Communist sharks." That is quoting General Torrijos.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LAXALT. For the purpose of the Record so it does not become confused, I say to Senator Matsunaga, I was not a member of that party, was I? I was not a member of the party.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. No, he was not.

Mr. LAXALT. The Senator was in a separate group. He was there when?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. In November of last year.

Mr. LAXALT. All right.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I was with that group which was headed by the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. LAXALT. I would not want anybody to have a misunderstanding that we had differing interpretations of the same meeting. The fact is that I was in the latter part of December and asked the general specifically of his relationship with Fidel Castro and to his credit—he did not back away one bit—he told me that Fidel Castro was a friend and trusted adviser.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Right.

Mr. LAXALT. And for us to think that he thinks that Fidel Castro is a Communist shark is dealing in utter fantasy. They are friends, they are buddies, and we better smarten up and recognize that fact.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Aha. We are friends I take it now with—as a matter of fact we have diplomatic relations with Russia. The Government of Panama, now headed by General Torrijos, has no diplomatic relations with Russia or with Red China for that matter. We are now courting friendship with both those countries. And this was pointed out to us: "You talk about fearing the Communists running Panama, but you have diplomatic relations with Russia; we do not."

And the implication of the statement made by the Senator from Nevada is that because Castro happens to be a good friend of General Torrijos, General Torrijos is going to invite Castro to run Panama. Far from it. He even said to us that communism is not suitable for Panama as it is for Cuba.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator think for a moment that General Torrijos would have admitted, if we ratified these treaties, he is going to invite Castro in?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I would like to take back the floor.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. No, I did not intend that. I wanted to quote the general relative to the matter of communism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) has the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the able Senator from Hawaii (Mr. Matsunaga). I fully agree with him.

It was not so long ago that I was in Panama with other members of the Foreign Relations Committee. We had a morning visit with Torrijos.

Now, I am not one who could be counted among the boosters of General Torrijos. I do not happen to care for dictators or for dictatorships. But I must say, in all fairness, that it will come as a great surprise to General Torrijos to hear himself described on the floor of the Senate as being a pro-Communist. I think that is just an astonishing argument, which, in the judgment of the Senator from Idaho, goes beyond the line of responsible indictment.

Mr. LAXALT. I do not recall that I made that type of allegation.

Mr. CHURCH. Well, you said he was a booster of Castro, a buddy, and that soon the two would be working together in Panama.

Mr. LAXALT. My impression of General Torrijos is that he is not an ideologue; he is a hard, tough, dictator, and that is who we have to deal with here.

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, that is my impression, too, and he is not going to share power in Panama with Castro or anyone else.

Mr. LAXALT. Is the Senator saying—

Mr. CHURCH. What I am saying is this—and I would like to say it without interruption, because I do have the floor—there is nothing about Torrijos that would suggest he is inclined toward communism. If there ever was a burgeoning free enterprise economy, you will find it in Panama today.

Mr. LAXALT. I would be—

Mr. CHURCH. In fact there are, by latest count, 63 major multinational banks located in Panama, the biggest concentration of banks outside the United States in this hemisphere. When we talked to the bankers and businessmen in Panama City, they did not tell us, "Look out for this man Torrijos; he is about to turn Panama over to the Communists."

Do you know what they told us? They said, "We believe the ratification of these treaties would represent good business."

Mr. LAXALT. That is the reason why we are here. If it were not for trying to protect the flanks of those eastern banks, we would not be here.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator keeps shifting ground. One minute he says we are promoting the interests of Communists, and the next minute he says we are promoting the interests of the banks.

Mr. LAXALT. I believe it is both.

Mr. CHURCH. How can it be both? The two interests conflict.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. On the question of Torrijos and his inclination toward communism, like the Senator from Idaho, I do not intend and do not want to be an apologist for Gen. Omar Torrijos. I do not think that is even proper to this particular matter that we are discussing. But I was in the delegation that Senator Matsunaga discussed, that went to Panama, and I had this very question in mind while I was there.

So I inquired of every person that I could about the Communist inclinations of Gen. Omar Torrijos. We, of course, inquired of him personally, and got the response that the Senator from Hawaii has already mentioned. But that was not enough. We talked to everybody, including his greatest enemies, the people in the Government and out of the Government who dislike Torrijos, who dislike his government, who are of political parties that are rivals, who would like to be functioning and be running for President.

Not a single one of them, his greatest enemies, the man on the street, the American citizens who had lived there 20 or 25 years and conducted business—not a single individual said they thought Torrijos was influenced by the Communists, or thought that he would try in any way to bring in a Communist-influenced government at any time while he was there in charge of Panama.

His response directly to me was that if he tried to bring in a Communist regime, he would be run out of the country by the people of Panama, and that if anybody else tried to establish one, he would leave of his own accord. President Lakas told us directly that that would be the only situation under which he again would take up arms, if General Torrijos or any other person tried to establish in Panama a Communist regime.

Now, nobody knows what the future is going to bring, but I think in these arguments we ought to try to focus on the situation as it is, and on what the best evidence available at this time would indicate.

Now, everybody knows that one way to stir strong concern in the people of America about any question is to raise the red flag of Communism, and that has really confused the issue that is before us now.

Mr. LAXALT. Do you not think the issue is relevant, Senator Huddleston?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The issue is valid, but we ought to look at facts and see just where we might be headed.

We found nobody, nobody in Panama, the people on the street, the people in government, the people out of government who wanted to be in government, enemies, friends, whatever, who had any concern about that government going toward the Communists.

Now, one student group did make this point: The only way, they told us, that there was any chance that the Communists would exert any influence within Panama would be the rejection of these treaties to allow this bone of contention—and it is the only bone of contention between Panama and the United States, and that is the operation, control, and ownership of the canal—if we allow that festering sore to remain and be exploited by people who know how to exploit that kind of situation, then we may run the risk of opening the door to additional Communist influence, but only in that way.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much for his intervention, and I agree wholeheartedly with his observation.

I think it might be well at this point to place in the Record the assessment of our own Ambassador to Panama on the subject at hand. Let me read from page 286 of the hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. This is the American Ambassador to Panama, Ambassador Jorden, speaking:

In the first place, I have come to know General Torrijos very well over the last 3½ years. I have spent a lot of time with him traveling around the country and in the capital. I guess at this point I know him about as well as any American. I can assure you that he is not a Communist. He is a man deeply dedicated to his country and to the improvement of his people's conditions. He has insisted on great improvements in education, health care and particularly for those people in the countryside who in the past have never had much opportunity for an education or for much help.

Just as a footnote, let me point out that as captain in the national guard he was rounding up a group of left-wing guerrillas and was shot by the Communists. It is very hard for me to believe that a man who was shot by the Communists can become a convinced member of the organization. In any case, all one needs to do is to talk to the man at great length, see what he has done, see what the impulse is in his government to quickly recognize that he is not a Communist and does not approve of the Communist system.

One of the things that is closest to his heart, for example, is the establishment in Panama of the largest banking center in the Western Hemisphere. Would bankers who are very astute observers be likely to establish banks there if they thought they were going to go Communist?

That is the testimony of Ambassador Jorden on this issue. I have wondered what the basis is for the argument that General Torrijos is pro-Communist, because it seems so utterly preposterous. Yet, when I listen to Senators, I hear them say, "Torrijos is pro-Communist because he visited with Castro."

Well, Mr. President, I visited with Castro. Does that make me pro-Communist? Other Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee interested in a more rational policy that would better serve our interests in the Caribbean, have visited with Castro. Does that make them pro-Communists? The Secretary of State, just a few weeks ago, went to Peking and visited with the leaders of Red China. Does that make Mr. Vance pro-Communist? The President of the United States will soon have dealings, as he has had before, with Mr. Brezhnev, and they will be extensive dealings. Does that make him pro-Communist?

I do believe we have to get this debate down on the ground, and discard these flimsy, preposterous charges. We must clear away this debris and consider the real question: Whether the treaties, serve the vital interests of the United States.

Let me return to the tests I suggest for evaluating the treaties.

Let us test the treaties against the four criteria mentioned earlier.

First, the United States must continue to enjoy the full use of the canal as an open and neutral passageway.

This criterion has two components, both of which, I think, are critically important: First, in time of a specific security need on the part of the United States, our vessels must have the right to go to the head of the line; and second, use of the canal must, to the extent possible, be immune from sporadic harassment.

As it was originally submitted to the Senate, the neutrality treaty was ambiguous regarding the U.S. right to go to the head of the line during emergencies. I therefore proposed that the Committee on Foreign Relations recommend to the Senate that the treaty be amended to make explicit the U.S. right of priority passage in time of emergency.

I note that sitting in the chair at this moment is the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. He was one of the first to suggest that the treaty be amended. It was Senator Hollings who, weeks ago, called the attention of the Senate to the need to amend these treaties so that there never could be any doubt about our right to priority passage any time in the future in case of need or emergency. I commend him for it.

There were other Senators as well. Earlier today the majority leader mentioned Senator Dole, of Kansas, who deserves credit in this regard. There were a half dozen Senators, including the majority and the minority leaders, myself, and others, who felt that the treaties needed to be amended in this respect.

So I proposed to the Committee on Foreign Relations that it recommend to the Senate an amendment to the treaties making explicit the right of the United States to priority passage in time of emergency. The committee adopted that recommendation with only one dissenting vote. Now I understand 77 Senators are cosponsors of the amendment.

U.S. rights pursuant to it, the committee report notes, "could hardly be more explicit." "What constitutes an emergency," the committee report states, "and when one exists, is for the United States and the United States alone to determine." This amendment is so central to the protection of our national security interests that, unless it is adopted, I would find it impossible to support these treaties.

The second component of a safe and open canal is that ships going through it not be subject to intermittent violence. If necessary, through the application of massive military might, I have no doubt that we could hold the canal in a hostile environment. It would be almost ludicrous to suppose that tiny Panama, through sheer force of arms, could somehow wrest the canal away from the United States. The real threat, however, is one that we cannot forestall through military means. I would again call attention to the testimony I referred to on Wednesday, that of the Commander in Chief of the Southern Command, Lt. Gen. D. P. McAuliffe. He told the Armed Services Committee that "one can easily visualize the use of standoff weapons only 5 miles away, off in the jungle."

They "wouldn't have to hit very much in the canal," he said, "but they would terrorize the employees and probably stop commercial shipping whether they sink a ship or not." So even if the canal remains technically "open," and even if most ships are able to get through without incident," it will not be used if vessels in it—and their crews—are even occasionally the targets of periodic rifle fire or mortar shells. The expert military witnesses who testified before the Foreign Relations Committee were emphatic in predicting that the resentment and recriminations bred by rejection of the treaties could soon spill over into acts of terrorism directed at the canal and the ships within it. General Brown indicated that threats to the canal are far more likely to be internal than external. In addition to the threat of intermittent violence described by General McAuliffe, General Brown testified that the canal is now vulnerable to acts of sabotage which could close it for extended periods of time. He also testified that in a "worst case" guerrilla war it could take up to 100,000 troops to protect the canal. The message is clear: that the Canal Zone, if this issue is not handled properly, has the potential of becoming a military nightmare, another Vietnam.

Let me just pause here to recount the exchange which took place earlier today between the majority leader and me emphasizing that this Senate is not acting under coercion. A person who goes out into a winter night and takes the precaution of putting on a coat before he opens the door and wades out into the snow is not acting under coercion. He is trying to sensibly accommodate himself to the situation he foresees when he opens the door.

Of all the silly arguments, none conjures up a more ridiculous scene than saying that the United States is being coerced by one of the smallest and weakest countries in the world to yield the Panama Canal.

Nor are we particularly concerned about terrorists. Every country has them. Whether this Senate rejects or ratifies the treaties, no one can assure us that there will be no trouble with terrorists in the Canal Zone in the future.

What our generals are talking about is a climate. If there is a hostile climate, created by the smoldering resentment of the Panamanian people who feel we are denying them their right to exercise jurisdiction over their land, then we could face severe problems defending the canal and keeping it safe as a peaceful passage-way.

There is not any question about how the people of Panama feel. They have already expressed their feeling in free elections, where more than two-thirds voted to ratify these treaties, and those voting against the treaties did so because they thought they did not concede enough to Panama. There was a 95 percent turnout. So, if we are to be prudent, we should take into account the strong feelings of the Panamanian people as a whole.

Not the terrorists, not the nuts, not the extremists, but the legitimate aspirations of the Panamanian people as a whole.

Either we are going to nurse their smoldering resentment along until it breaks out in hot flame; either we are going to wait until violence erupts again in the streets and Panamanians and Americans die, as they have before; either we are going to wait until the time death and bloodshed become the hallmark of our relations with this small country, or we are going to recognize that the time has come to make adjustments that all the Panamanian people feel they are entitled to, and all the world recognizes as legitimate. Let us make those adjustments under these treaties which protect the vital interests of this country in the years ahead; which insure an orderly transition; which reserve to the United States the right to defend the canal and have priority passage in the event of emergencies in the future; which are fair, and thus will bring us the respect of the world, because the world will know that the United States was not coerced into acting, but acted out of magnanimity.

The alternative, Mr. President, is to wait: wait for the bloodshed, wait for the violence, wait for the recriminations; wait for the kind of battle that history and experience suggest is in the offering if we deny these people their legitimate aspiration to reclaim their jurisdiction over their own land; wait until the taste of blood turns bitter on our tongues. Then, at last, we shall have to make the adjustment anyway—when we can no longer derive honor from it; when we cannot even salvage our dignity. Then we shall look back on this day and say, "Why didn't we have the foresight, the commonsense, to make the adjustments with honor and dignity by consenting to treaties which incorporated the traditional principles of our own land?"

The solution—and the only solution, it seems to me—is to retain Panama's friendship and cooperation. For only by avoiding a hostile environment surrounding the canal can we invite world commerce to use it. These treaties will constitute such an invitation.

The second requirement is that the canal be kept militarily secure. This means that it must be defensible against both external and internal threats.

Our capability to protect the canal against external threats will remain essentially as it is today: We will continue to rely upon our ability to sink enemy ships before they reach the canal. This is how the canal was protected during two world wars, and there is no reason to assume that that same method will be any less effective in the future.

Under the new treaty, the canal will be equally secure against internal threats. We will retain our bases in Panama through the end of this century. During this period we will have "primary responsibility" for the protection of the canal. Afterwards, Panama will be prohibited from allowing any foreign military forces, defense sites, or military installations within its boundaries. The most important protection against internal threats after Panama assumes full control, however, will be the United States' right to take unilateral military action against any such threat. Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty provides that the United States and Panama will "maintain the regime of neutrality established in this treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the canal shall remain permanently neutral * * *." As we all know, President Carter and General Torrijos, in their October 14 joint statement, interpreted this provision as allowing the United States to "defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently (to) have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal."

I was pleased to see the language of article IV so clarified; I think it is essential that the right of the United States to take unilateral action to protect the canal be made clear. While I am happy that both sides regard the clarification as legally binding, I believe that greater assurance is needed that this communique has the same force and effect as other provisions in these treaties. For this reason I sponsored, in the committee, the amendment which would include at the end of article IV of the Neutrality Treaty, an amendment incorporating this language into the text of the treaty itself.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I am happy to yield to my able friend from Maryland (Mr. Sarbanes).

Mr. SARBANES. I simply want, at this point in the debate, to recognize the extraordinary contribution which the Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) made in the consideration of these treaties. The Senator was instrumental in the recommendation for the incorporating into the treaties of the statement of understanding dealing with the right of the United States to act to protect the neutrality of the canal and the right of head-of-the-line passage for our naval ships. It was his sharp questioning in the course of committee considerations of the treaties which developed the case for such action.

It was his proposal in the committee, adopted as a committee recommendation to the Senate, which calls for amendments to the permanent neutrality which leave absolutely no question, no doubt, no ambiguity whatever, with respect to the American right to protect American interests in these two vital respects.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much for his remarks. He will remember that it was in the early stages of the hearings that we began to get reports of differing interpretations. I thought that was intolerable. I said then, and I had the full support of Senator Sarbanes at the time, that the Senate could not be expected to ratify these treaties if crucial provisions were being interpreted in one fashion in the United States and in another in Panama. It was after this development that President Carter asked General Torrijos to return to Washington and the interpretation of these crucial provisions was clarified.

As I have said before, welcome as the development was, in my judgment, it is insufficient to rest the interpretation of such vital provisions upon an unsigned communique by two heads of state. It is for this reason that I said we must put this language directly into the treaties themselves. If we do, I can support them. If we do not, I shall have to vote against them.

Mr. President, in the committee's report, the interpretation of the second amendment that we recommend to the Senate is made clear:

It allows the United States to introduce its Armed Forces into Panama whenever and however the canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. When such steps shall be taken is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act as it deems proper against any threat to the canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or non-military. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty. They do not terminate.

With this modification, will the treaties help promote military security for the canal? The best place to look for an answer, it seems to me, is to those who have the responsibility for defending it—the U.S. Armed Forces. According to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the United States would “without question” have the right to act unilaterally to protect the canal against any internal threat, including radical Panamanian rioters, for example. But again, the heart of it, the committee was told by General McAuliffe—who is directly responsible for the canal’s defense—is that the treaties will create a “friendly environment around the canal in which to operate.” We can conduct “our defense tasks better in a friendly rather than hostile environment,” he said. And while sabotage can never be ruled out, the incentive can be taken away by giving the Panamanians a stake in the canal. As Secretary of Defense Brown testified:

The most important factor in inhibiting such actions by frustrated groups in Panama is a situation in which the Panamanian Government and the bulk of the Panamanian people see the continued operation of the canal as in their interest.

It just makes sense. Commonsense.

Adm. Elmo Zumwalt, former Chief of Naval Operations, concurred.

The Panama Canal can never be made completely secure militarily. We know that. Neither can the Capitol. Nor can the Pentagon. Nor the country. But with the two modifications I have outlined, I am satisfied that General Brown is correct in saying that the security of the canal is actually enhanced by the new treaties. They will encourage Panamanian cooperation; they will prohibit—for the first time—the stationing of foreign troops in Panama; they will give the United States the unilateral right to act militarily in the canal’s defense; and they will give our ships the right to go to the head of the line in an emergency. Former Secretary of State Dean Rusk summarized the net effect of these guarantees:

If, God forbid, it should ever become necessary for a President and a Congress to take strong measures to keep the canal functioning and safe.

He told our committee:

They would be in a far stronger position to do so under the treaties of 1977 than under the anachronistic Treaty of 1903.

The third requirement is that the worldwide position of the United States not be weakened, and that the hand of our adversaries not be strengthened in Latin America. A natural tendency exists, after the Vietnam tragedy, to want an end to what some see as yielding and retreat by the United States. I see no point in debating here whether that perception is correct; my own judgment is that our foreign policy has been generally more realistic—and more humane—since our involvement in the Vietnam war ended. But whether that is true or not, the point must be made, and made emphatically, that the treaties now before us do not represent a retreat. The willingness to enter * * * sign of strength, not of weakness—just as it was a sign of strength, not weakness, to give the Philippines back to the Filipinos, and just as it was a sign of strength, not weakness, to give Okinawa and Iwo Jima back to the Japanese. We fought and bled for Okinawa and Iwo Jima during World War II, but the citizens of those islands were Japanese, and they wanted to live under the Government of Japan, and we concluded that it was right and just that they be allowed to do that, they were entitled to be restored to the jurisdiction of their homeland.

No one perceived our country as weak when we granted independence to the Philippines or when we returned Okinawa and Iwo Jima to Japan. Quite the contrary—these were seen as the acts of a self-confident nation, as acts of justice, as adherence to our principles—acts which benefitted our relations significantly in the Pacific. These treaties with Panama also will represent an act of self-confidence and of justice and of principle. One of the principles that Americans have always held highest is that of self-determination, and it would be ironic, indeed, if we were to renounce it in the case of tiny Panama today.

These treaties, in short, will weaken our adversaries and strengthen our friends throughout the Western Hemisphere. As Admiral Zumwalt testified, rejection of the treaties would “serve to separate us from our friends in Latin America,” and make our adversaries’ objectives easier to achieve in Panama and in neighboring countries.

A new arrangement governing the use of the canal, one which is mutually acceptable to Panama and the United States, would likely increase U.S. influence in Panama and in Central America. It would give leftists less to exploit, in Panama and around the world, and it would make other governments in Latin America less vulnerable to pressures from the left. It could, in sum, be the keystone to improved relations with all of the Hemisphere.

It thus appears to me that, on this count as well, the treaties pass muster.

Fourth and finally the treaties should be fair and should be seen to be fair. Fairness is of course relative: It is best measured perhaps by contrasting the new relationships with the old and by superimposing those old relationships on the United States.

There is an old Indian saying in the West you must never measure a man until you have walked a mile in his moccasins.

It is a pretty good test for eliminating the double standard.

In our hearings the American Ambassador to Panama William Jordan applied that test rather vividly. Let me quote what he said:

Suppose * * * that history had dictated that the Mississippi River and the territory on each side were controlled by a foreign power. Suppose that in going from Illinois to Missouri, or from Louisiana to Texas, you had to cross that strip.

And imagine, if you will, that you broke the law in some fashion—by speeding or having a tail light out, or whatever, and you were arrested by a French gendarme or a Mexican policeman. It does not take great imagination to know what our reactions would be. Yet that is the situation that our Panamanian friends have found themselves in for the past 70 years.

Americans are a fair-minded people, and I doubt that most Americans would view that sort of arrangement as fair.

Admiral Zumwalt summarized well the views of many witnesses. He said:

The present relationship is a colonial anachronism which is no longer feasible for a democratically-constituted nation to maintain.

The admiral said it well. The treaties, I believe, rectify this unfairness by giving Panamanians a stake in the operation of the canal pursuant to an arrangement that has been approved by two-thirds of the Panamanian people.

Therefore, it appears to me that the treaties, as modified, will pass each of the tests that concerned Americans have applied. They allow the United States to continue to enjoy the canal as an open and neutral passageway. They maximize the security of the canal. They strengthen our worldwide position. They weaken that of our adversaries. And because they are fair, they are likely to endure.

These are the treaties' advantages, but they obviously are not in our national interest unless the advantages outweigh the disadvantages.

What are the disadvantages?

There are, I think, seven principal arguments that have been made against the treaties. They—and what I believe are the answers to them—are as follows:

First, the familiar argument: We built it and paid for it. It is ours, and we should keep it. The answer is, I think, that we are keeping it, in the way that matters—the only way that matters. We are keeping it open and running, and that is what is important.

To argue about technical legal questions, such as who has "titular sovereignty," misses the point. It is use that counts. It is our right to protect the canal that counts. It is our right to go through first during emergencies that counts. And these rights are the ones guaranteed by the treaties.

We do not now possess "titular sovereignty" over the canal or the zone it occupies, under the current treaty, as the committee report makes clear. But even if we did, what good would it be if, in order to retain it, we had to jeopardize the canal's use?

So the answer, in short, is that the treaties do not give away our vital interests in the canal. They insure our ability to protect those interests.

As General Brown testified before our committee, they "provide the best way of assuring that we will be able to continue to use this canal." To refuse to approve the treaties would be the surest way to expose the canal to obstruction by terrorists, saboteurs, and rioters, who would have the sympathy of much of the world if the treaties are rejected.

The second argument is that we should not pay them to take the canal off our hands.

Mr. President, the answer to that argument is that we are not. These treaties do not commit the U.S. Treasury to pay one dime to Panama. Any money Panama receives will be paid out of operating revenues of the Panama Canal Commission, revenues generated by toll fees or by subsidiary services performed in Panama by the commission.

The statement of President Carter in this regard has been distorted. Several times today, in the course of the debate, I have heard his statement distorted. Let me read what the President had to say on this subject in his recent address to the Nation. President Carter said:

Under the new treaty, any payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal.

That is an accurate, factual, truthful statement.

As I have said, these treaties do not commit the U.S. Treasury to pay one dime to Panama. Any money Panama receives will be paid out of operations of the canal itself, and the tolls will be adjusted to generate those revenues.

It is true that Panama is in line for certain economic assistance, but this aid is apart from the treaties. We have given aid to Panama before, as we have to every other country in Latin America, and as we will again. But this aid has nothing to do with the treaties nor with the revenues to be derived from the treaties.

Most of the proposed new aid will consist of loans which must be repaid to our Treasury and which, in addition, will be granted under terms aimed at stimulating U.S. exports, and thus helping our own employment situation.

Panama never yet has defaulted on a loan from us. Its credit rating is good. There is no reason to expect Panama to default in the future, given the importance to its economy and its prosperity of maintaining that credit rating. So the American taxpayer will not be affected or set back by such transactions.

The third argument is that General Torrijos is a dictator and head of an unstable government. Much has been said about this already. Let me simply add that it is true that General Torrijos is a dictator, far from the worst in Latin America but not the most benevolent, either.

It is also true that most governments in the world today are authoritarian. They are dictatorships of one form or another. Of the 145 nations in the United Nations, probably not more than 30 would qualify as being elected under a free political system of the kind we enjoy in the United States.

It never has been our practice to deal only with fully developed democracies, for to do so would be to declare some 120 nations in this world off limits.

So the problem is not that the Government of Panama is a dictatorship and therefore unstable. As a dictatorship, it happens to be very stable. General Torrijos has been chief of state for 9 years. He has held the reins of government in Panama longer than any other Panamanian, since independence. There is no effective political opposition and no sign that he may be deposed. He has managed to retain his popularity among the people of Panama. We deal with him because he heads up the Panamanian Government, and there is no one else with whom to deal. So much for that argument.

The fourth argument made against the treaties is that General Torrijos is pro-Communist and the treaties, therefore, will lead to a Cuban or Soviet takeover of the canal.

The answer is that the Torrijos government is strongly nationalistic but not pro-Communist. It is true that General Torrijos has visited with Fidel Castro. So have I. So have a number of other Members of this body. But the Torrijos government does not even recognize the Soviet Union or China, and the economy of Panama, far from being socialistic, consists of a strong free enterprise system. Over 70 major multinational banks operate in Panama, including eight of America's largest. Banks are not wont to do business in unstable societies. There is moreover, no Soviet presence to speak of in Panama at the present time. Out of a population of some 1.7 million people, there are only a few hundred Communists.

The specific answer to concerns about a future Soviet or Cuban military presence, however, is that Panama will be expressly prohibited under the new treaties from inviting foreign troops into her territory. I mentioned this earlier but it bears repeating: Article V of the Neutrality Treaty provides that after the year 2000—the last year the U.S. Armed Forces will be present—“only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites, and military installations within its national territory.” This assurance against foreign military intervention is not contained in the existing treaty arrangement and represents a safeguard of considerable value to the American interests in the canal and the region.

The fifth argument is that the treaties will be yet another retreat by the United States, a “withdrawal” in response to threats and coercion. There is the feeling that somehow things are not as they used to be, and that is so. The world has changed. It used to be that gunboat diplomacy would serve to enforce our will in the Caribbean and in Central America.

But now it takes some respect for the rights of others, and that is a change for the better. I am glad it has happened.

I opposed the war in Vietnam for many reasons, from the very start. One of those reasons was my belief that our intervention in that civil war, among a foreign people in distant Asia, was not only unnecessary in terms of our own interests, but would weaken our international position and strengthen that of our adversaries.

To have become involved in a guerrilla war in the jungles of Southeast Asia was a grave mistake. I think most of us know and acknowledge that today.

Mr. President, I say the same reason militates with equal force against exposing ourselves unnecessarily to the risk of fighting a guerrilla war in the jungles of Panama. From the standpoint of our own domestic tranquility, from the standpoint of effective foreign policy, and indeed from the standpoint of simple justice, we would be seriously misguided to rely upon a military solution to achieve our objectives in Panama when the probability is that those same ends, an open, functioning canal which is militarily secure, can be achieved through the peaceful procedures outlined in these treaties.

Whether we again choose military power over the power of peace to effect our national goals will, it seems to me, say much about us as a society and the lessons we have learned from Vietnam.

The sixth argument that is made against the treaties is that there is no guarantee that Panama will not nationalize the canal and demand that we leave immediately.

This is true. There is nothing to prevent them from doing that right now. Under the new treaties—which commit both the United States and Panama to protect and defend the canal's neutrality—the moral and legal case of the United States would be far stronger were such an eventuality to occur. If the treaties are ratified, General Taylor testified, the “conflicts over the canal should cease to be a confrontation between an overbearing Uncle Sam, the Goliath of the affluent industrial world, and the tiny Panama, the David representing Latin America and the world's have-not community."

The final major argument is one that I also touched on a moment ago; namely, that the neutral status of the canal means that hostile warships could go through, in effect, under the benefit of U.S. protection. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown answered this objection directly at our hearings. "The last place we want to sink a ship," he said "is in the canal, and we will therefore depend upon our military power outside of the canal to serve our interests. The new treaties do guarantee passage through the canal. They don't guarantee passage to the canal . . ." I might add that the canal has always been administered as a neutral passageway; it has never—even during two world wars—been closed; and we have always been able to protect it by keeping enemy ships a safe distance away. If we cannot prevent enemy ships from reaching the canal, Henry Kissinger testified, "the provisions of a legal document will be precious little help."

So those are the major arguments against the treaties and the answers. Over the past 5 months I have carefully examined all the arguments, pro and con. During that period, the Committee on Foreign Relations has held 16 days of hearings on the treaties. Over 90 witnesses have testified. We have heard representatives of the administration, Members of Congress, and private citizens. We have heard fervid supporters of the treaties and vigorous foes. We have compiled a hearing record of over 2,000 pages.

I approached those hearings with no preconceptions about the issues they raise. Based upon the best evidence available, I have concluded that, on balance, with the two amendments I have discussed, the treaties are in our national interest.

In closing, Mr. President, let me say a word about the effect of these treaties on our perception of the past and our direction in the future.

The Treaty of 1903 has been characterized in many ways—as a vestige of colonialism, as a diplomatic dinosaur, as the product of a plot rivaling that of "The Sting." It is true that the history behind that treaty is not flattering. But however the treaty may appear today, I believe that there is no need for apology. The events surrounding the conclusion of the Treaty of 1903 must be viewed in the context of the times, when large powers acted much differently toward small powers than they do today. The world of 1903 was a world of empires—and of colonies. Most of the world's population in that year—in China, in Indochina, in Egypt, in India, in Persia, in Morocco, in Algeria, and throughout Africa—lived under foreign rule. They were governed by foreign laws that were administered by foreign governments—whether British, French, Dutch, Belgian, or German. The desires of the colonial people were largely ignored; they endured for the benefit of the empires that ruled them.

Those times, I am glad to say, are gone. The empires that governed the world in 1903 have faded into history. People in former colonies throughout the world have won the right to determine their own destinies. A hundred new independent nations have emerged since the 1903 treaty was signed.

So the issue before us, really, is whether we will accept change or whether we will resist it—whether we recognize that rigid efforts to preserve the past lead inevitably to tragedy—whether we are flexible enough to pursue our national interest by new means when old means fail. To adapt to change while preserving our vital interests is a work of statesmanship; to resist change by attempting to preserve the past is a work of folly.

This is not to denigrate the magnificence of our forefather's achievement—the building of the canal, it has rightly been said, was the moon landing of the age, a sublime translation of dreams into reality, a soaring triumph of engineering and medicine, of courage, and imagination. We honor those who built it, but we honor them not by grieving or glossing over past wrongs, but by rectifying present inequities and by insuring future harmony. We recognize the nobility of their achievement by preserving the canal, not as a crippled testimonial to mankind's irrationality, but as a working monument to international cooperation and good will.

This goal can be achieved, but it will not be easy. Indeed, it may require surmounting obstacles as great as any confronted by the builders of the canal themselves—perhaps even greater. For instead of yellow fever or malaria, we face the fever of nationalism. Instead of the darkness of the jungle, we face the darkness of slogans and half-truths. And instead of mountains we can see, we face a future that is obscure.

I repeat, this challenge can be met, but it calls for the most precious resources that we as a people can muster—not force of arms, but force of principle, force of character, and force of intellect. Not every nation could do so; a special strength is required, a strength deriving from our sense of self-security as a society, to accept change, to move ahead, and thereby to preserve rather than destroy the best that we have wrought from the past. Theodore Roosevelt—and it was Roosevelt, I think, who deserves most of the credit for building the canal—put it well when he said:

The important thing is the next step. It often happens that the good conditions of the past can be regained not by going back, but by going forward. We cannot recreate what is dead; we cannot stop the march of events; but we can direct this march and out of the conditions develop something better than the past knew.

Mr. President, I believe that these treaties will direct the march of events toward developing something better than the past knew. I urge the Senate to advise and consent to their ratification with the changes recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, I received this afternoon from Harold Brown, the Secretary of Defense, Cyrus Vance, the Secretary of State, Clifford Alexander, the Secretary of the Army, the following letter with enclosures. The letter reads:

DEAR SENATOR. As debate begins on the Canal Treaties, questions have arisen about the financial viability of the Canal under the new arrangements and also about financial obligations the United States will incur as a result of the new Treaties. Enclosed are answers to some of the principal questions which have been raised.

In the last analysis, the U.S. security and commercial interests these new Treaties are designed to serve cannot be measured in dollars. Under the past arrangements, the benefits that we have received from the Canal have far outweighed the costs of construction, security and the nominal annuity paid to Panama. We feel the costs associated with U.S. operation of the Canal between now and the year 2000 will be more than offset by the benefits derived from our continued use of the Canal during an orderly and efficient transition to Panamanian management, and from the continued maintenance of U.S. troops and facilities in Panama for the next 22 years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the letter together with the enclosures in the form of responses to these questions relating to the financial viability of the canal be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and enclosures were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., February 10, 1978.

DEAR SENATOR: As debate begins on the Canal Treaties, questions have arisen about the financial viability of the Canal under the new arrangements and also about financial obligations the United States will incur as a result of the new Treaties. Enclosed are answers to some of the principal questions which have been raised.

In the last analysis, the U.S. security and commercial interests these new Treaties are designed to serve cannot be measured in dollars. Under the past arrangements, the benefits that we have received from the Canal have far outweighed the costs of construction, security and the nominal annuity paid to Panama. We feel the costs associated with U.S. operation of the Canal between now and the year 2000 will be more than offset by the benefits derived from our continued use of the Canal during an orderly and efficient transition to Panamanian management, and from the continued maintenance of U.S. troops and facilities in Panama for the next 22 years.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

HAROLD BROWN,
Secretary of Defense.

CYRUS VANCE,
Secretary of State.

CLIFFORD L. ALEXANDER, Jr.,
Secretary of the Army.

1. Q: Can the Canal really meet its costs on the basis of tolls alone?

A: All the studies relating to the costs of operating the Panama Canal, and to the possibility of increasing Canal tolls, indicate that revenues will meet expenditures, including the payments to be made to Panama under the new Treaties.

Since 1915 toll revenues have risen from $4 million to $165 million in FY 1977. Traffic is projected to increase at an average annual rate of 2.2 percent until the end of the century. The best available studies project revenues as follows:

CANAL REVENUE

[In millions of dollars]

Toll increase	1980	1983
0 percent	197	205
25 percent	243	248
30 percent	250	254

Various estimates have been made of the Panama Canal Commission's operating costs. An exhaustive study on Panama Canal Commission cost projections has just been prepared by Arthur Anderson and Company for the 1979-1983 period. These projections conclude that Canal costs, including payments to Panama and taking into account inflation, will range between $238 million to $247 million in 1980 and between $237 million and $262 million in 1983.

Our negotiators made their calculations on the basis of a toll increase of 30 percent. Our studies indicate that even larger toll increases could be applied if necessary, to produce additional revenues. While the range of uncertainty increases for the later years of the Treaty period, we believe it is reasonable to expect that the Canal enterprise can meet all its operating costs, including payments to Panama required by the Treaty.

2. Q: Won't toll increases mean less traffic and less income?

A: A study of Canal traffic and revenue forecasts recently completed by International Research Associates concludes that substantial increases in tolls will produce a substantial increase in total income despite some drop-off in traffic. A 30 percent toll increase would generate 27 percent additional revenue in the first year, dropping to a stable 22 percent increase after seven years. A toll increase of 75 percent would increase revenues 58 percent in the first, dropping to a maximum attainable stable increase of 40 percent after 7 years.

3. Q: What about the hidden costs of higher tolls to the American consumers?

A: A toll increase of 20 to 30 percent over existing levels will have a minimum, if not negligible, impact on our trade and economy. A toll increase of about 30 percent will involve a total transportation cost increase for Canal shipments of less than 1 percent. Users of the Canal would pay only about $50 million more in tolls per year on cargoes that have a value of roughly $50 billion, or one-tenth of 1 percent. Of the $50 million, U.S. business and consumers will be the ultimate payers of only about $15 million. The overall impact will therefore be negligible both in terms of American businesses and the purchasing power of the consumer.

4. Q: How can we be sure the Panamanians will maintain the Canal so it can, in fact, stay open?

A: Under the new Treaties, Panama's self-interest will give that country every incentive to maintain the Canal and operate it as efficiently as possible. Furthermore, over the next 22 years, the United States will be working with Panama toward this end. Pursuant to Treaty provisions, we will establish training programs and provide on-the-job experience at all levels. Under our guidance, Panamanians will increasingly participate in management. Approximately 80 percent of the current work force is Panamanian, and there is every reason to believe that by the year 2000 Panama will be fully capable of operating the Panama Canal.

5. Q: Will the Treaties require any appropriated funds?

A: Payments to Panama under the Panama Canal Treaties will be made from Canal revenues, not tax dollars. Moreover, all operating expenses of the new entity will be paid from Canal revenues.

Administration spokesmen have testified on several occasions before Congressional Committees that the transition from our present role to our proposed role under the new Treaties would entail some costs in the U.S. budget. One major cost would be relocation of Defense installations, estimated at $43 million for the first three years. Another would be an early retirement program for Canal enterprise and certain other employees. The Canal Treaty provides for an optional early retirement program as an employee security assurance for these employees. The design of the program, however, will be at U.S. discretion. The programs which have been discussed within the Administration range in cost up to $150 million. There will be additional DoD costs resulting from a merger of the Canal Company and DoD activities, and assumption of any non-reimbursable costs for health, education and other support functions. The total appropriations impact over 21 years based on present information is unlikely to be much more than $350 million. None of the appropriated funds for these costs would go to Panama.

6. Q: Are there other budgetary implications?

A: Although not required by the Treaty, the Administration will recommend that the Treaty cease collecting annual interests payments from the Canal Company which have been paid since 1951 and which are currently averaging $18-$20 million. It will be up to Congress to decide whether to accept the Administration's recommendation. The Administration's recommendation is based on the fact that we have always treated the Canal as a public utility, the use of which benefits the country as a whole in peace and war.

A separate economic and military cooperation package of $345 million over five years—all in repayable loans, credits or guarantees—is planned. This package depends on development of programs to meet existing Congressional established criteria. Only about $5 million in appropriated funds would be required to support the repayment guarantees for the military credit program as a reserve fund; none would be paid to Panama.

7. Q: What about the contingent $10 million payment? Will we be obligated to pay off on that in the year 2000? Will it be part of the toll base?

A: The contingent $10 million annuity is payable only if operating revenues produce a surplus over expenditures, which include among others the variable annuity due Panama of $.30 per Canal ton and the fixed annuity of $10 million. The contingent annuity will not be figured in the calculation of the toll base.

If the surplus is insufficient to cover the entire payment of the contingent annuity, the shortfall is carried over to succeeding years. Since payment is contingent on available surpluses, the United States is not obligated to pay off on any accumulated unpaid balance in the year 2000. Panama's negotiators have acknowledged this fact.

8. Q: What is the value of property to be transferred to Panama under the terms of the Panama Canal Treaties?

A: Canal Company and Canal Zone Government property which will be transferred to Panama during the life of the Treaty had a net book value in 1977 of $96 million. The Canal, its related installations and other facilities which will be transferred upon termination of the basic Treaty are expected to have a net book value in the year 2000 of $98 million. Thus the monetary grand total of existing Canal Company and Canal Zone Government property to be transferred to Panama by the terms of the Canal Treaty is $194 million. Panama would also receive capital improvements to the Canal and its facilities made during the Treaty's lifetime which the Canal Company, based on planned capital improvements, currently estimates at $454 million. The true value of the Canal and its related assets, however, cannot be measured in terms of cash investments. The true value to the United States is measured in terms of our ability to continue to use the waterway.

The approximate acquisition and improvement costs as of fiscal year 1978 of military facilities to be turned over to Panama:

	Million
Treaty starting day	$27.5
Other facilities to be turned over sometime during the Treaty term	33.5
On termination of the Treaty	291.9
Total cost of military facilities	352.9

9. Q: What will be the military relocation costs to meet the requirements of the Treaties? Why should we bear any costs?

A: Lieutenant General McAuliffe, Commander-in-Chief, United States Southern Command, has made an initial estimate of the costs required for the first three years:

	Million
Relocation of Albrook (east of the runway) AFB facilities	$19.9
Relocations from Ft. Amador	17.4
Relocation of Curundu Antenna Field	5.3
Rehabilitation of postal facilities3
	42.9

These are preliminary figures which have not yet been subjected to any budget review process. Some costs are still under study and not available; e.g., those involving the exchange service warehousing complex, costs associated with surveying boundaries, installation of fencing, lights, etc.

The Treaty provides that we will maintain a military force in Panama until the end of the century. With or without the Treaty some relocation would be recommended in the interest of efficiency.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada (Mr. Laxalt).

Mr. LAXALT. Just a comment or two in response.

Senator Church has indicated, as have the proponents throughout the course of this debate, that all we are giving up is titular sovereignty, that we are actually improving our position by giving up this canal.

I submit that the fact is that we are giving up a multibillion dollar facility which American taxpayers have paid for, perhaps for not 1 cent of compensation in return, and in addition, that we are going to pay, the American taxpayers will pay, millions and millions of dollars during the life of this treaty.

The issue is not one of fulfilling Panamanian aspirations per se. I, for one, and I speak for many of my colleagues in opposition to these treaties, certainly am sympathetic with the Panamanians. They have been good allies. They are good people.

But the essential tradeoff in this situation is that we are being asked to fulfill those aspirations and perhaps risking our national security.

That is not my opinion; that is the opinion of realistic military experts of this country, and I would like, for the purpose of this record, so that it is back to back with the letter submitted by Senator Church, to read a portion of a letter written on June 6, 1977 to President Carter. This letter was written by former U.S. Navy Admirals Arleigh Burke, Robert B. Carney, George Anderson, and Thomas H. Moorer—and recognize that Thomas H. Moorer was Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In this letter, they explain the strategic importance of the Panama Canal. And remember that these people are independent. They are independent of this administration, they are responsible to nobody but to their own consciences and to the American public, and this is what they say concerning the strategic value of this canal that the American people are being asked to give up:

Our experience has been that as each crisis developed during our active service—World War II, Korea, Vietnam and the Cuban missile crisis—the value of the Canal was forcefully emphasized by emergency transits of our naval units and massive logistic support for the Armed Forces. The Canal provided operational flexibility and rapid mobility. In addition, there are the psychological advantages of this power potential. As Commander-in-Chief, you will find the ownership and sovereign control of the Canal indispensable during periods of tension and conflict.

And that is what this debate is all about. Because when you strip it all away, we are being asked, without justification historically, morally, or otherwise, to give up a facility which is important to our national security, of great strategic importance, for no proper justification.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to our colleague from the State of Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator Garn.

Mr. GARN. I thank my distinguished colleague from Nevada.

Yesterday I sat on this floor at some length listening to our distinguished colleague from Alaska (Mr. Gravel), and we ran out of time; I was unable to respond. I wished that I could have then, and had my remarks immediately follow his. I am sorry that that did not take place, and I am sorry that the Senator is not here now; but I do feel compelled to respond.

With all due respect to the Senator from Alaska, I found it a little bit difficult to believe what I heard, and I listened for over an hour.

I did not hear much in the way of debate on the treaty. I did not hear a discussion of issues. All I heard was the putting down of this country, and the horrible, unbelievable things that we had done in 1903, our shady, shoddy, dealings—here on the floor of the U.S. Senate, for over an hour, he downgraded us point by point, telling how we had treated the Panamanians so badly, with little or no mention of the great benefit of this canal to the Panamanian people.

Oh, there were a couple of references to those of us who oppose the treaties. He said "Oh, well, the opponents will say the country would never have existed without the canal."

That is true. Why throw that away as an argument? It is simply true. Without the hundreds of millions of dollars of benefit derived indirectly because the canal is there, Panama would not exist as it does today. So there are intangible benefits that cannot be counted. I do not know what they measure, but they are tremendous.

From my experience in being in Panama and talking with Panamanians, I do not sense all of this animosity and all of this hatred I hear about, and all this condemnation of the United States. Most of what I heard down there was that they wanted the canal back, that they believed in national sovereignty; but there certainly was not all this criticism from Panamanian citizens that I am hearing from Senator Gravel of Alaska and others about how terrible we were. I heard none of that, absolutely none.

I do not think there is the animosity in Panama that we are being told. I did not talk to a large percentage of the population, but I certainly have talked to a representative proportion of that population. And, as I mentioned very briefly yesterday, if we want to go back and moralize, there are a lot of areas that we could look at, and one of them is Alaska.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. GARN. I will be happy to.

Mr. CHURCH. Not on Alaska, but on the Senator's assessment. I agree with the Senator from Utah on the feeling of Panama toward the United States. That was my impression as well. I believe it is good, for many reasons.

Chief among them is the expectation that the United States, having concluded these new treaties, will proceed to ratify them and develop a new relationship.

The Senator himself has acknowledged, I think honestly, that the people of Panama feel the Canal Zone should be restored to their jurisdiction, and that they should manage and operate the canal. The treaties will eventually accomplish those objectives, and I think this is one of the reasons that their feeling today is very good toward the United States.

But should these treaties be rejected, should we make it plain to them that we are not prepared either to restore their jurisdiction over the zone or to ultimately transfer to them the management of the canal, I really believe that their attitudes toward us will change very drastically.

Mr. GARN. Well, I think it goes beyond what the Senator has said. I talked with Panamanians who not only were not anti-American at all, but who were very appreciative, who recognized more than some of my Senate colleagues do what the canal and the United States had done for them, and expressed their appreciation.

It was interesting the number of people whom I talked to who said they had voted against the treaties, and the reason that they had, although they wanted the jurisdiction under their country, even though they had voted "no"—the reason that they voted no was because they understood that they lived in a dictatorship; that if they had had a democracy that they could trust they would have wanted the canal under their jurisdiction, but they did not want it under Torrijos.

I did not talk to one Panamanian employee of the Panama Canal Company, not one, who did not say that he was opposed to the treaty, and again they expressed their patriotism toward their country, but that they trusted our Government more than their own. They felt they had more job security, more justice and decency in toil than they had with their own government running it, again because of Torrijos.

We cannot overlook the fact that we have not dealt with a democratic form of government; we have dealt with an absolute and total dictator. And interestingly enough, many of those who expressed this nationalist interest have said to me, "We wish in the treaties, even though we were for them, that it could have been worked out for the United States to continue to operate the canal through some sort of management arrangement, because we do not trust our own government to be able to run it, but we do trust yours."

These are Panamanians speaking, not Americans, not Senators. So I got an entirely different viewpoint down there.

But if I may now get back to Alaska: we pulled off one heck of a deal up there. We talked about the economics all afternoon yesterday.

Alaska is the biggest State in the Union. It is more than twice the size of Texas. It has unbelievable natural resources. I do not know what the value of Alaska would be, but certainly in the hundreds and hundreds of billions of dollars. We bought it from Russia for $7 million.

If we are moralizing, I think we better look at that. Interestingly enough, in the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee Dozer testified that the Russians did question the validity of the Russian sale. The question was answered by the admission of Alaska into the Union as a new State. I am sure they did not expect to get it back. They wanted to make some rustle about it and possibly get more compensation. As the junior Senator from Alaska mentioned in real estate parlance, what a steal.

My good friend from Maryland mentioned yesterday that we got Manhattan Island for a strand of beads. There is an exchange we could discuss, too, except that, because of the economic condition of New York, I am sure the Indians would not want Manhattan back.

When I visited the President of Mexico and talked about undocumented, illegal aliens, he immediately picked up a map for Senator Baker and me. It showed the North American Continent, Central America, and Mexico's original boundaries. He said,

I would like both of you Senators to know that the first undocumented workers were Americans in Mexican territory and you ripped off more than 50 percent of Mexico. So we start our discussions from that point.

The first undocumented workers really were Americans intruding into Mexico, including the Mormon pioneers in Utah, who went from Utah into Mexico.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It sounds more like the Senator would moralize on the Mexican war. There was no need for us to go to war with Mexico, no provocation at all. We did and, in fact, ripped off where the Senator lives and where I live. In fact, for $10 million we bought a piece of territory from Mexico which paid over $405 million in taxes last year. So moralizing is a great mistake.

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator from Arizona. That is the point I was trying to make after listening yesterday. There are a lot of issues to debate, on legality, on jurisdiction, on ownership, all of those things, whether we did it legally or illegally, and the dramatic story told about what happened down here in a hotel, and about how bad we were. There are a lot of things in our history we could go back and redo if we wanted to moralize in that way.

The major point I wanted to make on this issue, is, No. 1, that I do not view this country in that way. Certainly, we have made some mistakes, and there are some times in our history that we have not done the right thing. We would be foolish not to admit that.

But I look at a country which entered World War II—and I hear all this about a colonial, socialist empire in the Canal Zone—with more than 2 million troops, which had the atom bomb when no one else had it. If any country wanted to rule the world we could have at that time. We could have easily taken over and would have become the ruler of the whole world.

Did we choose to do that? Did we choose to keep any territory whatsoever? None. We not only backed off and signed all kinds of agreements with our former enemies and our so-called ally, the Soviet Union, but we disarmed to the point where 5 years later, in 1950, we were caught with our pants down in Korea, or almost as bad a situation as we were in 1937 and 1939.

We had no colonies. We were not imposing our will in an imperial way on anyone. And not only that, but we rebuilt Europe and we rebuilt Japan. We rebuilt our friends and our enemies. In this period of time we as a nation spent more than $200 billion of our tax revenue on others, while providing more material abundance and a higher standard of living for our own people than any of God's children who have ever lived on the face of this Earth. We have shared our wealth and our taxes from our work like no other country in the history of this world has done.

That is the kind of country that in which I am privileged to be a U.S. Senator, one which has been generous, which has not taken advantage of other people, which has always tried to be the home of the oppressed, the leader of human rights, the leader of freedom and democracy in this world. That is a record of hindsight that speaks for itself.

But I heard nothing but degradation yesterday about how immoral we were in Panama. I want that rejected. I think the American people reject the argument that we should ratify these treaties and that we should give up the value of this canal and everything we have done as Americans in helping Panama.

Let us debate it on the facts in the treaty, item by item, and whether it is a good or a bad treaty. But let us quit downgrading our country.

We have given help voluntarily and we continue to do it. That is why we are a great and a good Nation.

I reject this idea of moralizing. I am sick and tired of those who use this as an argument, those who seem to want to rip apart—whether it is the CIA or whatever—the various institutions of our country, and not recognize the overwhelming good of the United States of America.

I am up here waving a flag. You better believe I am. I am wrapping myself in it because I think most American people would agree with what I say.

I just could not let that pass yesterday. I am sorry that Senator Gravel is not here because I wanted to rebut him directly.

For a few minutes now, I would like to present some remarks directly on the treaty.

Let this not be misunderstood as a partisan issue. It may have been mentioned—I have not been to all of the debate—that a couple of years ago, when Gerald Ford was still President of the United States, there was a resolution passed around this body which 38 U.S. Senators signed, and I was one of them. It said:

We will not vote for any treaty which gives up operational control and sovereignty of that canal. President Ford, so do not send us one.

That was enough to defeat it. For 38 was more than one-third. I happen to be a Republican Senator and he was a Republican President. So when I criticize the Carter administration for this treaty it should not be interpreted as partisan, because if the same treaty were here from Gerald Ford I would stand up and say the same things, and I did. It is in the record. It proved that 38 U.S. Senators were opposed to it when Gerald Ford was President.

I think it is important to note that this opposition has not sprung up from some partisan feeling.

When President Carter first announced the signing of these treaties my initial reaction was opposition. That opinion had been formulated a long time before he became President, that I would not vote for any treaty which gave up operational control of that canal.

I would have been willing, and still would be willing, to negotiate a new treaty, which I think is needed, which could greatly diminish the size of the Canal Zone, giving back surplus land to the Panamanians.

There certainly is not need for all of the land that we own. There is certainly room for renegotiation of the terms of the treaty as far as compensation is concerned. There are so many areas we could renegotiate. But we must maintain the minimum amount of land necessary to operate and defend the canal itself.

I think that would be in the best interests of the United States and the best interests of the Panamanian people.

If the Panamanian people had a say in this rather than their dictator, I think they would be willing to accept that kind of a settlement as well, feeling they could have their cake and eat it, too. They could have much of this land back, much more control over it, but a government that has run it since 1914 could continue guaranteeing that the canal be operated successfully, be operated out of revenues, and be defensible for all ships to go through.

Well, although I had announced my opposition initially, I still wanted to go down and see firsthand. So I, as about half of our colleagues have done, went to Panama. I spent 5 days there with Senator Baker and Senator Chafee. I had very extensive briefings with members from the Canal Zone Company, including Governor Parfitt and General McAuliffe. I suppose we got the same treatment that everyone got, and a very extensive briefing.

I spent an entire day with General Torrijos, touring parts of the Canal Zone and visiting with him at great length.

People said, "Well, what is your opinion, after having been there?"

My opinion? I came back with the absolute knowledge, with no doubt in my mind, that we were dealing with an absolute dictatorship. General Torrijos runs that country singlehandedly and does have absolute control. There have been, in the past, tremendous violations of human rights in that country.

In talking to the members of the Panamanista Party, hearing them outline some of the things that happened to them in the past, we asked them how they dared speak to us. They said it was because they were enjoying a holiday. Since the treaties had been signed, General Torrijos was trying to be very good, was trying to present a favorable image of what a wonderful and kind man he was. They hoped it would take a long time for these treaties to be resolved one way or another because they did have some human rights in the meantime, while Torrijos wants to build his image.

I said, "What happens afterwards, after you talk to us?"

They said, "We hope that after having appeared before you, that would guarantee our safety, that you would intercede for us. We want you to write down our names and check up on us after this treaty thing is resolved one way or another."

So after looking at the military, economic, and political situation in Panama, I came home feeling even more strongly that my decision was correct.

My experience in Panama is not just a 5-day visit. I used to haul cargo to Howard Air Force Base when I was just a mere Air Force captain, and not a Senator getting VIP treatment. I was not interested in a treaty at that time. I was not involved in politics. But it did give me an opportunity, over a period of years, of going through there, to talk to a lot of people.

I also gained the assessment at that time that there was not this overwhelming anti-American opinion that I hear so much about. I experienced none of it, going in and out of there as just a common, ordinary American wandering through the streets of Panama City, talking to people. I emphasize that point from a number of years of experience and not one 5-day period.

Then, within a week after arriving back, the Committee on Armed Services, of which I am a member, held hearings on the military and economic aspects of this treaty. Once again, after listening to these very detailed briefings, I became even more convinced that these treaties are wrong. I have heard they should be passed because they are right. I submit they should be defeated because they are wrong.

We can begin again. There is no reason to say that, because they are defeated, this is the end and we are going to have violence. We sit down again and say, "Yes, a treaty is needed, let us sit down and negotiate something that is fair and equitable to both countries," not something that is overwhelmingly unfair to the United States and to the benefit of the Panamanian dictatorship, run by Omar Torrijos.

The reason that I continue to become more opposed to the treaty is because I learn more about it. We constantly hear from the President and others that the more the American people learn about this issue, the more they will be in favor of it. That has not been my experience. It has not been my experience at all. Mine has been just the opposite.

As I have given speeches and read directly from the treaty, some people who were in favor have said, "I did not know that was in the treaty; we are not doing that, are we?"

Yes, we are, sir; we are.

Some of those who say, "I still want to give up sovereignty and give it back to the Republic of Panama," are not in favor of the terms under which we are giving it back.

Let me address myself to the economic issues and to quote some of the misunderstanding the American people have. Most people that I have talked to have the impression that nothing changes until the year 2000, that we are all right for 22 years, so we hope everything works out. Governor Parfitt testified before the Committee on Armed Services that the dominant and all-encompassing change of the treaty is immediate recognition of Panamanian sovereignty and general territorial jurisdiction over the present Canal Zone.

That is immediate. More specifically, he said the treaty would eliminate the Canal Zone government and the Panama Canal Company and substitute therefor the Panama Canal Commission.

Other quotes from Governor Parfitt:

As of June 30, 1977, the net book value of property, plant and equipment in the canal enterprise was $567 million.

I might make a remark that net book value is what bookkeepers talk about in terms of depreciated value. It has nothing to do with market value or replacement value, which would be in the billions of dollars.

(Mr. Ford assumed the chair).

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is $9.8 billion.

Mr. GARN. $9.8 billion. So just looking at the net book value, it is rather substantial.

He goes on to say:

On the effective date of the treaty, an estimate $92 million of these assets will be transferred to Panama and $30 million to other U.S. Government agencies. An additional $4 million in assets will be transferred to Panama during early phases of the treaty. Property initially retained by the Commission and additional acquisitions during the life of the treaty would also go to Panama at the conclusion of the treaty. Our current estimate is that the net book value of such property at termination date would amount to $522 million, making the total value of transfers to Panama $618 million.

That is $618 million in bookkeeper's terms and the Senator from Arizona has pointed out it is over $9 billion in replacement value.

We are going to pay them 30 cents per Panama Canal net ton for going through the canal, a fixed annuity of $10 million a year—again, these are quotes from the Governor's testimony, not the opinions of Senator Jake Garn—and $10 million for certain specified public services to be provided in the canal.

Yet the Comptroller General of the United States, Elmer Staats, says that it is the estimate of the Canal Zone Company that it will only cost the Panamanians $4.4 million to provide these services and the treaties make no mention of quality of service.

Staats goes on to say that, at the very least, we ought to have the services relate to the cost of providing them and we ought to have an accounting method for determining what that cost is. And he talks about how it ought to be reasonable that before we transfer property, we have an inventory. The last time one was conducted, in 1950-51, before the present Canal Zone Company was incorporated, it cost $750,000 to do it. He has no idea what it would cost now.

The reason I am pointing these things out is that it is constantly said that these treaties will cost the American people nothing. That is true if everything goes according to Hoyle and the canal toll revenue increases do not reach a point of diminishing returns and the Alaskan oil continues to flow through the canal. If all of these projections work out, and it stays self-sustaining, these things will come out of toll revenues. But there are some other costs that directly impact on the American taxpayer immediately and have nothing to do with the revenues of the Canal Zone Company.

For instance, we loaned money out of the U.S. Treasury on which the present Canal Zone Company pays $20 million a year in interest, but that is going to be forgiven.

We are going to write off the debt. We are going to say, "Don't pay it back; you don't have to pay us $20 million a year."

Well, $20 million is not much out of a half-trillion-dollar budget. But, nevertheless, it is a fact that there will be a cost to the American taxpayers, something that they will no longer receive.

We have also heard that there is not much difference, treaty or no treaty. Again quoting Governor Parfitt:

Summary results for fiscal 1979. . . . Using the most recent estimate of tolls ($195 million), it is projected that there would be $9.3 million earnings without a treaty and a $36.7 million loss with a treaty—

Or a difference of $46 million the first year of operation—

Our analysis has also covered the period fiscal year 1979 through fiscal year 1984 in order to include the transition impact as well as the first year effect—in fiscal year 1984—of indexing the payment to Panama for each Panama Canal ton of shipping transiting the Canal. The predicted shortfalls in revenues range from $36.2 million to $58.9 million and are shown on this chart.

So he goes on to say that, obviously, tolls are going to have to go up. And they will go up if we do not have a treaty.

Mr. LAXALT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GARN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAXALT. Do those figures reflect the assumption by DOD that service costs are going to have to be taken over after the transition period?

Mr. GARN. No, they do not.

Mr. LAXALT. Does the Senator have the DOD figures on assumption of those costs?

Mr. GARN. Yes, I do.

Referring to Governor Parfitt, he says:

If revenues and costs develop as projected, it appears that periodic toll increases will be required, treaty or not. With a treaty, the need is sooner and greater.

Switching over to Comptroller General Elmer Staats' testimony—he runs the General Accounting Office which is considered to be the watchdog of the Treasury—he talks about some of these transitional costs.

He mentions that it is very difficult for him to estimate them and the reason that he cannot is that we have been promised since September, or October it was, the implementing legislation from the Department of State. We still do not have it. So we have been asked to consider these treaties without being able to know what the real economic impact is directly on taxpayers now, besides the forgiving of the debt, the guarantee that we turn over a debt-free canal in the year 2000, and the forgiving of the interest.

He said the treaty provides that the commission will continue to provide certain utility services and would be reimbursed for its costs. Yet no mention in the treaty of Panama's debt for past services which totaled over $3.4 million as of September 30, 1977.

They owe us $8.4 million which they have refused to pay for selling them electricity and other utilities. Omar just does not want to pay and we have not pushed him to pay.

This is a good accounting statement that I agree with, again quoting Elmer Staats:

We believe this debt should be settled by either a lump sum payment or as a credit against payments to Panama.

We are not pushing for that.

Talking about the $10 million lump sum for services that were provided the Canal Zone, Staats talks about how no quality of services is mentioned. If you want to go down and look at the Canal Zone quality of services compared to the Republic of Panama, you can see this.

The Panama Canal Company estimates it would cost about $4.4 million to provide specified public services.

So we are padding in $5.6 million.

Here is another statement I totally agree with from a good old-fashioned accountant:

We believe that payments to Panama for public services should be based on the costs incurred and that procedures should be developed to verify these costs, both during the treaty's first 3 years and thereafter.

How can you disagree with that?

I say again, this is the wrong treaty, whether you are for a treaty or not. This one should be defeated because it is wrong.

Other treaty related costs? Staats said there had been no discussion about that:

We have focused on the treaty related costs for the Panama Canal Commission which would be charged against toll revenues.

We would like to point out the possibility for additional related costs to be borne by other U.S. Government agencies. Unfortunately, only sketchy details are available at this time.

Again I repeat, we are operating on a treaty with only sketchy details of what it is going to cost.

Is that what the American people want us to do? Do they want us to pass this kind of legislation based on sketchy details that are not yet available to us?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GARN. I am happy to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am not certain of what I am about to say, so I will ask it in the form of a question.

Did Governor Parfitt say that he was talked to by the negotiators or did he say he had never been talked to by the negotiators on these cost points?

Mr. GARN. I cannot answer the Senator's question because I did not hear it, I was not in the committee at the time he made the response to those questions.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It seems to me he made that comment. I will check on it and see.

Mr. GARN. When I was in Panama, he made one statement, that on the testimony that he would give before the committee, a lot of the information was not available to him as yet when the treaty was being negotiated.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Well, I will find out. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield on that point, it is my understanding that Governor Parfitt did have discussions with Ambassador Bunker and that there had therefore been consultation with the negotiating team.

It is correct, as the Senator from Utah has just said, that a number of the studies on which some of the most recent testimony has been based were not available until very recently; that involves the Brandeis study which was commissioned, jointly, by the Panama Canal Company and the State Department; it also involves, I gather, the study of the consultant employed by the Armed Services Committee which commissioned a report in this area, and also an internal study that was undertaken by the Panama Canal Company.

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator because I think he is correct.

This indicates to me another very great fault in the treaty negotiating process. It would seem to me it would have been better for the negotiating team to wait for these studies to be completed before launching into a final treaty so that they would have the benefit of this information while writing the treaty.

Now, we do not have the benefit of the implementing legislation while we are debating. I hope it is available before we are through.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield just on that point, the negotiators did have available to them earlier studies which had been made on the basis of which they made certain projections on a very conservative basis.

The fact is that the subsequent studies have been more optimistic about what can be done financially and economically than the earlier ones that were used by the negotiators.

For instance, earlier a figure of 40 percent was being talked about as the increase in tolls to meet projected costs. Governor Parfitt, in front of the Armed Services Committee, and I think it is fair to consider it a reasonable figure, talked of a 20-percent figure for the increase in tolls to carry us from now until 1984, that is through the first period, compared to the earlier figure of 40 percent.

The other thing Governor Parfitt put forth in his testimony was that he projected that without a treaty, with no treaty, there would be by the end of the century an increase in tolls of 95 percent. That is with no treaty. With a treaty he projected an increase of 115 percent, or a difference of 20 percent in terms of a projected increase in tolls with the treaty and without a treaty by the year 2000.

Mr. GARN. I thank the Senator for that comment.

I would quote once again from Governor Parfitt on the sensitivity of canal revenues to increasing tolls. He said:

Essentially, the study indicates that canal traffic is sensitive to toll increases beginning at 15 percent up through the maximum increase possible of between 75 and 100 percent, the point where diminishing returns set in.

Also, he talks about—the net toll yield to be derived from two representative toll increases, 25 and 50 percent. The ultimate gain, from a 25-percent toll increase, is 19.6 percent. For the 50-percent calculation, the net amount is 33 percent. Increase of more than 50 percent would result in little additional revenue. In fact, it is estimated that the very maximum amount of additional revenue obtainable is about 40 percent, and this would require a toll increase of between 75 and 100 percent.

Although he did say during that brief 5 or 6 years they could get by with what you said is about a 20-percent increase, to 1984, he is talking about maybe upward of a 75-percent increase by the year 2000. His final statement is—

Nevertheless, I believe you should be alert to the possibility that the canal operation may not be self-sustaining in the out years.

Mr. SARBANES. I am sure the Senator does not disagree with the statement, because it comes straight from Parfitt's testimony and then his appendices.

He projects that without the treaties there will be a 95-percent increase in tolls by the year 2000—without the treaties—and then in another table projects that with the treaties there will be an increase by the year 2000 of 115 percent—namely, a difference of 20 percent in terms of the increase in tolls with the treaty and without the treaty. That, of course, is taking into account inflation and the fact that you are going to have rising costs, and so forth.

He made it very clear that the tolls are going to go up in any event, with or without the treaty.

In the annexes to his testimony, he indicated that without the treaty, they would go up 95 percent—that was his estimate—and with the treaty, they would go up 115 percent, or a difference of 20 percent.

Mr. GARN. I quote again from the appendices:

Over the longer term, if revenues and costs develop as projected, it appears that periodic toll rate increases will be required, treaty or no. With a treaty, the need is sooner and greater.

His estimates are based on some projections specifically having to do with North Slope oil continuing to go through the canal. It is tremendously doubtful whether it can be self-operating without that North Slope oil. There are certain plans for pipelines within the United States to stop that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a comment on that?

Mr. GARN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not think what the toll increase is or is not has much to do with the goodness or badness of this treaty, because we have inflation now that we are not going to stop, and inflation bothers the canal.

Another matter I was going to address myself to is the North Slope oil. He was very quick to forecast the end of this great tonnage that has built up but which even now is leveling off; and as we complete the pipelines across the United States to relieve the west coast of, you might say, the overdose of North Slope oil, the tolls are going to go down.

The interesting thing to me about Governor Parfitt's testimony is that it revolves around the year 1984. He made some pretty sound and understandable estimates up to that year, but then he was quick to admit that he did not know what was going to happen after 1984, but it was going to cost the U.S. Government—meaning the U.S. people—money. What that money is going to be varies in the opinions of different persons.

According to my arithmetic and the material I have talked about this morning and put in the Record, it could cost the American taxpayers more than a billion dollars, probably more than that. But, again, it is a pretty hard thing to judge, because we do not know yet how this new commission is going to operate as compared to the Panama Canal Company, which I think is probably the finest run business we have.

When we start putting Panamanians on the board and making political appointments to the board, I do not know what we are going to see. So it is after the year 1984 that bothers me.

This also bothered me the other night, when the President of my country told the American people it was not going to cost them any money. This is just an outright falsehood, and I hope he corrects himself before he lights that fire the next time.

Mr. GARN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me on that point? It is an extremely important point.

Mr. GARN. I will yield briefly, but I am taking the time of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. What the President said in his statement to the people was that under the new treaty any payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is wrong.

Mr. SARBANES. I think that is an accurate statement, and in the course of the debate, we can show that it is an accurate statement.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is not accurate.

Mr. SARBANES. Any payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships that use the canal.

Mr. GARN. I might just quote from the Comptroller General of the United States, and we will use him on this point of whether it will cost the American people any money, whether that is an accurate statement of the President.

He is speaking of this IRA study that has been utilized in this debate a great deal. He said:

Unfortunately, the IRA study does not analyze the sensitivity of traffic to a two-stage or multistage tollrate increase. Who would bear the cost? Who would bear the ultimate burden of fulfilling the treaty obligations to Panama? Since the treaty calls for Panama to receive benefits from the canal's existence that it is not receiving presently, someone or some group would be paying more. U.S. citizens could potentially be affected in two roles, as taxpayers of the country that operates the canal and guarantees payments to Panama.

On that point, it should be made very clear that the President might luck out just on that one point. If you interpret his statement rather narrowly, he might luck out. If the North Slope oil continues to go through, if the toll rate increases do not meet the point of diminishing returns, if all this guesswork into the year 2000 is correct, he may luck out. He will not still be President, because he can serve two terms at most. Some of us hope he will not have a second term. Nevertheless, he will not be around when this happens.

But we do guarantee, we simply guarantee these payments, whether the toll revenue is there or not.

So I repeat:

U.S. citizens could potentially be affected in two roles, as taxpayers of the country that operates the canal and guarantees payments to Panama.

The $10 million subsidy each year, the $10 million for utilities—everything but the 30 cents per net Panama Canal ton.

He continues:

* * * as producers or consumers of products shipped through the canal

The United States is the destination for approximately 30 percent of the traffic, and therefore, U.S. consumers would pay about 30 percent of the higher tolls.

So let us be honest about it. Whether the total amount of these revenues we are giving away, which we are not going to receive, are small in terms of our total budget and our gross national product, which they are—let us not insult anyone's intelligence—we cannot get away from the fact, either proponents or opponents, that this treaty will cost money. We can debate whether it should or not. I am just saying that the American people should know what this treaty does, and that is what we are trying to point out—that it is a bad treaty, poorly negotiated, and very disadvantageous to the United States.

I want to quote once more on this point from the Comptroller General, his concluding statement:

If canal transits fall short of what is currently estimated, it is possible that toll revenues will be insufficient to cover the cost of the commission, including the scheduled payments to Panama.

He said, "scheduled payments to Panama." I would not be so upset about the economics if all this came out of toll revenues. Then, if Panama does not run it very well, that is tough luck. They are not going to get the revenues, strictly speaking, from an economic standpoint.

I quote again from the statement by Mr. Staats:

In this eventuality, the U.S. Government is likely to be required to provide financial assistance either through congressional appropriations or by allowing the Commission to borrow from the Treasury.

I should like to ask the question as to who put the Panama Canal back in operation? The U.S. Navy did. If this canal does not operate, who is going to put it back into operation and who is going to pay for it? Let us not kid ourselves. It is going to be the U.S. Government, the American taxpayer, the consumer. If there is any trouble down there economically, we are going to be called in to bail them out.

I was asked about other treaty-related costs and was interrupted at one point, but I should like to finish the testimony of Mr. Staats before I make other comments. Mr. Staats said:

In our discussion today, we have focused on the treaty-related costs for the Panama Canal Commission which would be charged against toll revenues. We would like to point out the possibilities for additional treaty-related costs which might be borne by other U.S. Government agencies.

Those are direct costs to the taxpayers.

He continued:

Unfortunately, only sketchy details are available at this time.

These costs include early optional retirement payments for canal employees, estimated to be about $8.4 million a year; subsidy for hospital and education services for estimated 2100 to 2400 employees transferred to the Department of Defense.

Relocation and other costs to the Department of Defense, estimated at $43 million.

Discharging the existing accrued leave liability for employees transferred to Panama and other U.S. agencies.

Under questioning, he said he had no idea what the other treaty-related costs would be. There was no way to estimate. There is over $50 million now that he could tell, but he could not tell until the implementing legislation was drafted, so that he was able to come back with estimates. When that is going to be I do not know.

Let me get back to another financial aspect.

Governor Parfitt told us when we were there that it cost $65 million a year to maintain the canal. That is due to geological faults, slides, keeping the canal open and dredging operations, that is keeping the locks, the doors, the wheels, the motors, the engines, all of those things going. That is a lot of money. It is an old canal, and it works amazingly well, but it costs a lot of money to keep it going, $65 million a year. And I said this directly to General Torrijos. I said: "With the unbelievable economic and social problems you have in your country, who in the year 2000 can keep from the temptation of dipping into that $65 million?" Certainly it is in the interests of Panama to keep the canal open. So it would not be robbing the whole thing. It would just be a little robbing Peter to pay Paul. Maybe we will take $5 or $10 million this year. Defer this particular maintenance until a year or two because we need this for housing. That may be a very worthwhile purpose.

But in a dictatorship, the Panamanian people have no control, and a man on the streets of Colon, as General Torrijos did, can cut the educational fee in half just by snapping his finger, with no consultation with anybody. He does not have to sign a paper. He did it in 10 minutes on national TV. "The great general has cut the educational fee in half." He may have been trying to impress us with his goodness. What he impressed me with was his absolute power even though it may have been a good act. As I told the general, the temptation of politicians to dip into that fund is tremendous, and I will give a specific example.

I was mayor of Salt Lake City. We had a general fund as most cities do. Property tax revenues provided the general funds for police, fire protection, all the usual services provided by a city.

And then we had a separate airport utility and a water utility, and they were guaranteed to operate out of their own revenues from landing fees from airplanes and from water revenues, water sales for the water utility.

I think it is interesting to note that for the 7 years I was in local government every single year I was there there was an attempt made by one or another member of the commission, to avoid facing the wrath of the public by having to find sources of revenue, like raising the mill levy or property taxes. "Hey, don't you think we can take a million or two out of the water utility fund this year?" They would say.

No; I do not, because we had 1,000 miles of water lines that needed repair. Maybe we could get by and one would not break this next winter. Maybe we could and maybe we could not. Maybe we could defer building the new water treatment plant but then we could not meet the water pollution control standards.

The temptation is there in every American government. We have a State constitution that requires use to balance the budget every day or the mayor goes to jail.

So in a very well run city that balances the budget for whatever reason, in this case the law, with a democratically elected mayor and city commissioners, the temptation was there. I am not criticizing. I am just saying it is a fact of life that exists in politics.

So no one can convince me that a Panamanian Government, run by someone like Torrijos, or whoever follows him, could resist the temptation of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and I doubt very seriously that as to a maintenance fund, whatever it might be in the year 2000, they could keep their hands off of it or at least a part of it because it does happen in every American city across this country.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee I am going to have a great deal to say during this debate about the military aspects and the defense of the canal, but because of the desire of other Senators to speak, in particular Senator Sarbanes, today I will leave that part of my presentation out and today address only the economic issues.

As long as I am talking about a water utility, let me give an analogy of the Salt Lake City Water Department, a public utility run out of its own funds. I wonder how long I would have been mayor if when I was mayor of that city I had told the people that I had found some reason for saying that I had treated some previous owners of the water department land, the watershed and the resources of that utility, badly, even though maybe legally. Possibly I had been a little bit shady, despite the fact that we had provided all kinds of revenues and benefits, serving 400,000 people water every day. It did not make any difference, I had come to the conclusion that the only way that I could solve this problem was to give away the utility. I decided to give away all the assets, the water treatment plants, the storage reservoirs, the distribution reservoirs, a thousand miles of water lines, 4,000 fire hydrants, the shop facilities, the maintenance facilities, the administrative office, millions of dollar worth of assets. These assets were initially paid for by funds out of the general fund of the taxpayers of Salt Lake City and later turned into a utility—very similar to the situation in Panama when we turned it over in 1952 to the Panama Canal Zone Company, with indebtedness to the general fund of the United States. What would have happened if I had said not only am I going to give it away lock, stock, and barrel without asking anything in return, I am going to guarantee these people a percentage of the revenue from the water sales every year. I am going to give them a subsidy of $10 million a year. I am going to pay them more than twice as much for them to provide services as it cost back in the old water department era. I am going to guarantee them additional revenue if there is any surplus, and this is going to be of great benefit to us because they will not agitate any more, they will not criticize, and we are just going to give it away. We are going to go from about $2.3 million a year we are paying for these previous rights, and we are going to increase it to $60 million to $70 million a year. We are going to withdraw our people in 22 years. We are going to turn it over to them to run, and you might experience a doubling of your water rates, but that is to your benefit and it really is not going to cost you any money because it is not going to come out of the general fund; it is going to come out of water rate increases. I wonder how long I would have been mayor of that city?

I think it is a very close analogy to what we are doing financially. I am not even arguing the matter of sovereignty at this point, or ownership. I am talking about the economics of this package. I not only would not have been mayor very long, I would have to run very rapidly to get out of town before I was tarred and feathered.

And I could make the same analogy about the airport. Give it away and pay somebody to take it.

On the economic aspects of this treaty alone, I would have loved to have followed the President for about 15 minutes and not given one opinion of Jake Garn, simply quoted the testimony of the Comptroller General of the United States and Governor Parfitt, and let the American people decide, because I submit the more they learn about the terms of this treaty, even those who may think that we ought to return it to Panama will say let us do it on better terms and let us guarantee that we can defend it. Let us clear up this nebulosity, the ambiguities.

Gen. Maxwell Taylor testified before the Armed Services Committee that this is one of the beauties of this treaty, that it is so flexible and ambiguous that we could interpret it most any way we wanted to after the year 2000. I think we better tie it down just as tight as we can if we are going to have a treaty and let us not deceive the American people. Let us not deceive them. Let them know the facts of what has been drafted and what we are considering.

And if they do they will resoundingly say to this body: "Defeat this treaty; go back to the drawing boards and negotiate something that is fair to both sides."

I yield back to the Senator from Nevada at this time and will reserve my remarks on the military aspects for a future date.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the Senator from Utah. At this time I yield the remainder of the time to the Senator from Maryland, Senator Sarbanes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Sasser). The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, one cannot really think seriously about the Panama Canal, about these treaties, and about the whole complex of issues involved without gaining an understanding of the tremendous emotional appeal which the canal has for so many people. You cannot read David McCullough's book, "The Path Between the Seas," or any other book, for that matter, that discusses the canal and its construction and operation with any sensitivity, without sensing the symbol which the Panama Canal represents and the emotion which it carries for so many. I respect and appreciate the achievement which the Panama Canal represents.

It was an extraordinary achievement by the United States in two significant respects. First, as an engineering accomplishment; it functions today as it functioned 64 years ago when it was first opened; and second, as a triumph in the health field: American physicians, American nurses, and American medical personnel solved that critical problem and made it possible to build the canal.

I have enormous respect for those pioneers, and for the people who followed in their footsteps in carrying out this great enterprise. They showed skilled professionalism in building and operating the canal and making it an international waterway which commanded world praise.

I do not approach this issue—and I frankly think it is important not to approach it—with any sense of guilt in terms of the American contribution. I agree with what Senator Church said earlier in the day, that he and other proponents of this treaty do not approach this issue with any such attitude.

Now, to say that is not to say that it is unimportant to understand the history of how the 1903 treaty came about. It is very, very important indeed, because it explains the Panamanian perception of the current legal arrangements between our two countries governing the canal and the use of the canal. A knowledge of that history enables one to understand why Panamanians have such deep feelings that the 1903 treaty is not a satisfactory basis upon which to rest the relationship between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama.

So, without minimizing what was accomplished by Americans in the building and running of the canal, it nevertheless is important to know the history of the 1903 treaty; to know that it was negotiated and signed not by a Panamanian but by a Frenchman who had a very vital personal interest in such a treaty, because it brought $40 million to a French Canal Company of which he was a significant stockholder; to know that there has been resentment in Panama from the very beginning because the treaty is seen as overreaching by a great power; to know that when the treaty was subsequently brought to Panama for ratification, the threat of withdrawal of American protection for Panama and hence the loss of its independence and the likely death of all revolutionary leaders was used, as a very effective coercion, to compel signatures to the ratification of a treaty the Panamanians, even then at the very outset, regarded as totally unacceptable.

It is important to go back and know the history at the outset, because it has darkly clouded the relationship ever since. It is one of the basic reasons why the existing arrangement has never been accepted in Panama as a proper basis for the relationship between our two countries regarding the canal.

Now, having said that by way of background, the critical question is: Are these treaties in the best interests of the United States?

When we make that judgment, we must be very careful to understand that the choice before us is not the status quo, not the existing situation, the change embodied in the two treaties, the permanent neutrality treaty—note that it is permanent—and the Panama Canal Treaty which governs the relationship for the next 22 years. The choice before us is between the change embodied in those treaties and the change that will occur if there are no treaties. Change will come—there will be consequences and developments—whether the treaties are approved or rejected. If the treaties are approved, we will have a framework that will determine the course of developments. If the treaties are rejected, it is incumbent, especially upon those who want them rejected, to speculate on what the course of events will be, what will take place, what will transpire, and how effectively we will be able to continue to use the canal and how beneficial to us will be our presence in Panama and throughout Latin America.

There are some who say, "Go back and negotiate"; if that suggestion is made in earnest, then it must rest on the realistic expectation that a new agreement can be negotiated which will be acceptable to both parties. I am very frank to say I think it is totally unrealistic to suppose that new negotiations will lead to an agreement that will as fully accede to American interests as the agreements before us do. There is no reason to suppose, and in fact every reason to believe otherwise that all Panamanians will be more accommodating of U.S. interests if these treaties are rejected. Even now significant elements in Panama feel these treaties are too favorable to the United States but the treaty having been approved by the people in a referendum they are prepared to live by them and carry them out fully. My prediction of what would happen is that in a few years time, negotiators would come back and say, "This is the best agreement that we are able to get." Then there will be lamentations and everyone will say: "Oh, how we wish we had accepted the agreements that were before the Senate in 1978. Oh, how much better those would have been in safeguarding and protecting the American interests." If an acceptable treaty arrangement is not reached then the United States will have to improve its view, with all that entails, upon a hostile and antagonistic country. How much better to have our agreed arrangement at the basis of our relationship.

It is my own view, after having reviewed the testimony very carefully, that these treaties are very clearly in the best interests of our country. First, they recognize and protect our defense and strategic interests. The American military will have every needed facility over the next 22 years in Panama. That is not a situation we could hope to guarantee without these treaties. That American presence is being accepted and agreed to by the Republic of Panama.

With the amendment that has been recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee and that has been introduced under the leadership of the majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) and the minority leader (Mr. Baker), the United States is given the right, clearly, without any doubt, to take any action that it deems necessary in order to protect the permanent neutrality of the canal after the end of the century. There is no time limitation on that right.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have come before the Foreign Relations Committee and testified unequivocally in favor of these treaties. General Brown in particular has indicated his very strong personal feelings in support of these treaties.

Some have raised the charge that "these active duty officers are not telling you their real opinion but simply obeying the Commander-in-Chief." We went into that very carefully with General Brown. In fact, at one point General Brown indicated that he welcomed the question, because he wanted to answer that charge.

He made it very clear that in appearing before congressional committees, he and the other military people recognized that their responsibility was to answer questions placed to them truthfully, in accordance with their best views.

While military officials did not go out on their own initiative and take positions in conflict with the decisions of the President, they did upon appearance before the Congress, a coequal branch of government, in response to questions give their personal view even if it was contrary to the President's position. He cited instances in which the Joint Chiefs had done exactly that and expressed publicly before Congress their opposition to a Presidential decision.

Defense Secretary Harold Brown, who was sitting next to General Brown, then said:

I would like to say something about this because I think perhaps my uniformed colleagues cannot say it. It is this: The kind of charge to which you are referring is an insult to our senior military officials. I believe it is not helpful to the debate any more than it would be helpful to the debate if the proponents of the treaty were to question the motives, the integrity, or the honesty of those who oppose it.

I know there are retired military people who are opposed to these treaties; there are retired military people who support them. The present Joint Chiefs are very much for them. I do not question the motives, the honesty, or the integrity of any of those people, proponents or opponents. I may disagree with their wisdom or I may disagree with their judgment, but I do not question their integrity. I hope all engaged in this debate would share that attitude and we can banish from this Chamber any notion that the present Joint Chiefs in discharging their grave responsibilities are not giving us their honest opinions.

Second, I think these treaties protect important American economic interests which are involved with the Panama Canal. All the members of the Panama Canal Commission Board, which will run the canal over the next 22 years, will be appointed by the United States, and a majority, 5 of the 9, will be Americans. The four Panamanians will be put forth by Panama, but appointed by the United States. This Board will set the tolls; will determine the budget; will make allocations for maintenance, and is therefore, in a position, in the course of exercising those responsibilities over the next 22 years, to protect the operations and the maintenance of the canal and to develop an orderly transition to Panamanian operation of the canal.

In my view, the President's statement to the Nation, his fireside address, in which he said that all payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the canal, is correct. The testimony thus far on that point has indicated that it is clearly possible, with a reasonable projection of shipping traffic and reasonable toll increase, estimated at 20 percent for the next interim period, to produce the revenues called for by the Panama Canal treaty for payments to Panama.

The arrangements it should be stressed, give Panama a vested interest in the successful operation of the canal; and it also gives them a vested interest in maximizing the amount of traffic which moves through the canal. Much of what they will receive from the fee tolls is based upon the amount of tonnage—the more tonnage which moves through the canal the more their payment will be. Therefore, there is a tremendous incentive for Panama to seek to operate the canal in such a way as to maximize its use as an international waterway.

Opponents have put forth varying large sums as to what the canal is worth, book value, replacement value, original cost, and so forth, but the basic point they must recognize is that the true worth of the canal depends upon the use of the canal. Owning the canal is of no significant value if you cannot use it. The canal's worth is in its use and that is what these treaties safeguard.

Third, these treaties clearly serve important foreign policy interests of the United States. The treaties have significance not only for the United States and the Republic of Panama, but significance throughout all of Latin America and, indeed, throughout much of the rest of the world.

Why should we give our enemies around the world an issue to use against us when we have the opportunity to settle this matter in such a way that our own interests—strategic and economic—are fully protected. We can deny our opponents an issue which they have used and continue to use throughout many corners of the world?

Finally, I think these treaties are fundamentally important in determining the perception the American people have of themselves, in our perception of what we stand for as a nation, and how we intend to achieve our national objectives.

These treaties are preeminently important because they provide the United States with a justified moral and legal basis for the use of American power to protect American interests let us repeat that: with a justified moral and legal basis for the use of American power to protect American interests. I regard that as extraordinarily important.

We are the world's most powerful country. We can use our power to protect our interests. We can invoke that power as we choose to assert our interests. But I regard it as extremely important, in terms of the willingness of our own people to support such actions, and in terms of the support such actions will receive from people abroad, that the use of our power be done on a firm and justified moral and legal basis. These treaties give us the opportunity to do that in a way that the existing arrangements do not.

There is no guarantee as to what the developments will be; no one can guarantee what the developments will be. Everyone must face the fact that the choice is between the developments which will come with these treaties and the developments which will come without these treaties. There are risks in either course.

In making that choice, I have come to regard these treaties as an opportunity, as a positive opportunity, for this great country.

These treaties give the United States, give to free American people the opportunity to protect our interests and to do it in a way that will command the support and the respect of our own people and the support and respect of people throughout the world.

We ought not to view these treaties, and I reject the attitude which views these treaties, as salvaging the best of a bad situation, which regards the treaties in a negative perspective.

The present situation offers the United States a positive opportunity. It offers us the chance to move forward. Historians, McCulloch most recently, have talked about the vision and the foresight of the people who built the canal 70 years ago and what that meant. He went on to say in endorsing the treaties that the same opportunity is before us today.

I agree with that. I think there is an opportunity here to look ahead with vision, to see clearly the interests of this Nation and, therefore, to take action approving these treaties, with the modifications recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee. Such approval will make these treaties a historic achievement for the American people, and for the protection of American interests. It will show a great power bringing might and right into harmony.

These treaties offer the chance to bring forth the best—the very best that is in the American people; to call upon the finest traditions for which this Nation stands, and to do it in such a way that our defense, our economic, all our interests are protected, are safeguarded in a way they could not otherwise be done. It can be done consonant with the very best of what America stands for.

These treaties are an opportunity which this Senate and this Nation ought not to lose. I strongly urge their approval.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, debate on the Panama Canal Treaty is to close at the hour of 5 p.m. today. The hour of 5 p.m. having arrived, debate is closed.

MR. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the treaty be extended for 5 minutes.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MR. CLARK. Mr. President, I want to take just 5 minutes further to discuss some of the essential issues that are before the Senate.

Mr. President, from the time that President Carter and General Torrijos signed the new Panama Canal treaties last September, I have stressed several ideas which I feel are fundamental to developing my position with respect to their ratification:

First, it seemed to me most important that my judgment would be based on what is best for the United States. As the distinguished majority leader told the Foreign Relations Committee:

I have tried to focus my own analysis of the treaties on one basic question: Are the treaties in the best interests of the United States?

President Carter approached the treaty question in exactly this way. "Throughout the negotiations," the President said in his television presentation, "we were determined that our national security interests would be protected." Second, I recognized the need for updating the 1903 treaty—a conclusion reached earlier by five Presidents—three Democrats and two Republicans, and just as many Secretaries of State. As former Secretary of State Dean Rusk put it before the committee:

• • • the treaty of 1903, as amended, offers a very fragile platform on which to try to stand in these closing decades of the 20th century • • •

Secretary Rusk called the 1903 treaty a "legal anachronism." I believe that to insist on this concept of perpetuity in the world of today is not only unrealistic, it can be extremely dangerous and counter to our national objectives. I particularly liked the way the Philadelphia Inquirer described the situation:

The central issue is not the "surrender" of U.S. rights. It is the advancement of U.S. interests.

Third, I accept the position, made so eloquently before our committee by many witnesses—including, may I emphasize, all the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—that the U.S. strategic interest is in the guaranteed use of the canal, not in ownership of real estate.

Secretary of Defense Harold Brown:

I see three elements which together make up our national security concerns relating to the canal. These are, first, unimpeded use; second, effective operation; and finally, physical security of the canal. These are our paramount objectives.

Gen. George S. Brown, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

U.S. military interests in the Panama Canal are in its use, not its ownership.

Gen. Bernard Rogers, Chief of Staff of the Army:

I can certainly defend the Canal much better under the new treaties than under the present one.

Adm. James L. Holloway, Chief of Naval Operations:

These treaties in my judgment enhance the probability of our maintaining use of the Canal.

Gen. Louis H. Wilson, Commandant of the Marine Corps:

I support the President in his seeking a new treaty with Panama.

Lt. Gen. Dennis P. McAuliffe, the present U.S. Commander in Panama, and the soldier immediately responsible for maintaining our security there:

Our capability to keep the Canal open • • • will be enhanced, considerably enhanced, by the provisions of the treaty.

David McCullough, author of that extraordinary book on the canal "The Path between the Seas," and a man who knows and loves the canal as much as any American, put this so well. "I support the treaties," McCullough said, "because I support the canal; I know its importance, I know our interest is vital." But McCullough goes on to emphasize that what matters is "continued use of the canal • • • not ownership."

I think Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker stated our interests as well as anybody:

We want a Canal that is open to all the world's shipping—a Canal that remains neutral and unaffected by international disputes.

We want a Canal that operates efficiently, profitably and at rates fair to the world's shippers.

We want a Canal that is as secure as possible from sabotage or military threat. And we want full and fair treatment for our citizens who have so ably served in the Canal Zone.

To achieve these goals, the United States does not have to own the canal, as indeed it does not know.

Fourth, I was very much aware of the consequences of inaction, or rejection of the treaties. The canal is a narrow channel, 50 miles long, operating by an intricate and integrated system of locks, dams, and related facilities. It is an extremely fragile and vulnerable facility. As conservative columnist George F. Will put it:

Given the vulnerability of the canal's locks, and today's technology (and ideology) of free-lance violence, it is harder for the U.S. to protect the canal than to protect Europe.

Now to recognize this fact is not to yield to political blackmail. President Carter said explicitly that he "would not hesitate to deploy whatever armed forces are necessary to defend the Canal." But we have already been told by General McAuliffe, commander of our forces there, that in the event of a rejection of these treaties by the Senate he would need immediately another 40,000 to 50,000 troops. Critics of some of the economic provisions of the treaties might note this, and imagine what that would cost. But even then our military can not guarantee that the canal can be kept functioning. In my judgment, a satisfactory arrangement with Panama in which that country and its people have a deep and abiding interest in the continued operation of the canal makes a lot more sense.

Fifth, as to the treaties themselves. I believe that the basic U.S. interests are protected adequately in the new Panama Canal Treaty, which governs our relations until the year 2000. Under the terms of that treaty, I think it is clear that during this period the United States will control operation of the canal, and that U.S. military forces will be in Panama to provide for defense of the canal. We will retain the right to manage, operate and control the canal, its maintenance policies, its employment practices, and its toll rates from the signing of the treaty to the year 2000. And we have the land and water rights necessary to run the canal; and we will have military bases there with which to defend it. As one witness, William Rogers, put it in his testimony:

The formalism of the Canal Zone will disappear, but otherwise the new treaties will cause virtually no alteration to the present mode of operation, management and control of the canal.

We will also have during that period, it is worth emphasizing, an opportunity to train Panamanians for those more complex administrative and technical tasks from which they were systematically excluded in the past—though I think it is worth noting that already 70 percent of the labor force is Panamanian. But we should have no doubt as to their ability to take over the canal operation. Patrick Hughson, president of the American Association of American Chambers of Commerce in Latin America, whose membership includes 17,000 U.S. and host company businessmen in the hemisphere, told our committee:

As U.S. businessmen in Latin America, we are well aware of the competence of Latin Americans, including Panamanians, as many currently serve in high-level corporate positions, successfully managing large complex, multi-million dollar enterprises.

Have no doubt, he said, that the Panamanians will "master the technical and managerial requirements for administering and operating the canal." That from people who know.

I was, however, not quite as confident about the Neutrality Treaty, which governs our relations after the year 2000. I was concerned—particularly after hearing some contradictory interpretations from the Panamanian side—that two basic rights that I consider essential could be challenged: to take such measures as are necessary to keep the canal neutral and open to ships of all nations, and to receive expeditious treatment—go to the head of the line—when we felt it was necessary.

Finally, I resolved to withhold my judgment on ratifying the treaties until the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on which I sit, had held hearings, listened to testimony, and had fully debated the details and possible amendments to these extraordinarily intricate and involved documents.

The Foreign Relations Committee has done just that. We heard administration witnesses—all the key persons, from Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Defense Secretary Hal Brown to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Transportation, the negotiators themselves, the Governor of the canal, and the military commander for the canal.

We heard congressional witnesses, from determined opponents such as Senator Thurmond, who strongly criticized the treaties, to Senator Hollings, who was so eloquent in their defense. We heard a parade of outside witnesses from organizations of all political persuasions, including the Panamanian Committee on Human Rights and the Liberty Lobby. We listened to panels of experts—leading international lawyers, historians, economists, persons with special expertise on Panama. And we heard testimony—in support of the treaties—from two distinguished former Secretaries of State, Dean Rusk and Henry Kissinger.

In all, in 15 days of hearings, our committee heard more than 92 witnesses, took more than 2,000 pages of testimony. In addition, as the hearing record shows, not much bearing on the canal either in the public press or in private correspondence between Senators and the administration experts escaped insertion into the record.

I think it can be justifiably argued that the committee fulfilled its responsibilities to learn what is in these treaties, and to know what they mean. There was an incredible attention to detail. Let me give you just one example: On the issue of how to incorporate the Statement of Understanding between President Carter and General Torrijos—about which I will say more later—into the Neutrality treaty. The committee debated almost a full day on whether it was better to put it in as a single, verbatim text, or to separate it into different sections of the treaty. A small point, it may be argued, particularly as the lawyers told us that in terms of international law it did not make any difference. But we, as politically sensitive individuals, were determined to incorporate this understanding in the clearest, most unambiguous fashion possible, and that is why it took rather long.

One development during the process of our committee's handling of the treaties must be described in detail. As I mentioned earlier, I and many of my colleagues had some measure of uncertainty about the language of the Neutrality Treaty dealing with the dual U.S. rights—of taking whatever action is necessary to deal with any threat to the neutrality of the canal, and of receiving preferential treatment for our warships in case of an emergency. Our concern persisted even when we learned that this language had been drafted by our military planners and was acceptable to them.

I might add that the American people apparently also shared this concern that the U.S. rights be preserved. A poll conducted by the New York Times and the Columbia Broadcasting System last fall found that 49 percent of those polled opposed the treaties, and 29 percent approved. But when asked, "Suppose you felt that the treaties provided that the United States could always send in troops to keep the canal open to ships of all nations. Would you then approve of the treaties?" Sixty-three percent approved and only 24 percent disapproved. The "no opinion" category had dropped from 22 percent to only 13 percent. I submit that the inclusion of this Presidential statement meets precisely the concern that the United States will always be able to take any action necessary to meet any threat to an open and functioning canal.

For most of us, these concerns were partially met on October 14 when President Carter met General Torrijos in the White House, and issued a joint statement of understanding directed at just these two issues. These are of such significance that it is worth quoting them verbatim.

As relates to the right of the United States in the period after the year 2000—and let me note in passing again that prior to that time, we have troops on scene and the problem does not exist.

Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal—the Neutrality Treaty—Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal.

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

And with respect to the right to "go to the head of the line," the language of the statement is:

The neutrality treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the canal expeditiously. This is intended and it shall so be interpreted to assure the transit of such vessels through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly.

I submit that this language—"first grader language," as President Carter calls it—clears up any doubts which may have existed about the U.S. right to take any action unilaterally to meet any threat to the neutrality of the canal, and that we are assured of expeditious passage.

But there was still a problem. What is the legal significance of a "statement of understanding" between two heads of government? Would international courts or arbitration panels give full credence to this statement? Did it equate fully with the text of the treaties? On balance, the answer is probably "yes." But I, for one, did not want to leave the slightest doubt. And that is why I cosponsored in committee the recommendation that the language of the statement be incorporated into the treaty as an amendment. That was approved 14 to 1 in the committee, and I trust that this will be the action of the Senate in dealing with this amendment here on the floor.

The addition of the statement language as an amendment, and the further addition of a couple of technical understandings which we approved in committee, strengthen, in my judgment, an already excellent pair of treaties.

The additions make the ratification of these treaties, I have concluded, to be in the best national interest of the United States. Providing the basic features of the treaties remain fundamentally unchanged by Senate action, I intend to vote for their ratification.

Let me attempt today to discuss some of the key issues relating to the treaties, and explain in somewhat more detail why I feel them to be in our national interest.

THE ISSUE OF SOVEREIGNTY

I am not sure that this any longer plays such an important role as it did during the early weeks of the debate. The probable explanation is that there was virtually no disagreement among the legal and diplomatic experts that Panama has always retained titular sovereignty over that territory, and that the United States bought neither sovereignty nor property for that $10 million, but certain rights for which we then paid an annual fee. I can quote no better authority on this than Phillipe Bunau-Varilla, the Frenchman chiefly responsible for drafting the treaty:

The United States, without becoming the sovereign, received the exclusive use of the rights of sovereignty, while respecting the sovereignty itself of the Panama Republic. (Italics in original.) U.S. officials from as early as 1905 on have repeatedly acknowledged that Panama retains at least titular sovereignty over the Zone. President Eisenhower's decision to let the Panamanian flag fly in the Canal Zone was specifically to give "visual evidence that Panama does have titular sovereignty."

The contention that the Canal Zone is as much a part of this Nation as Alaska or Louisiana is simply historically inaccurate. The language of the transfer of Louisiana to the United States in 1803 provided that France cede "forever and in full sovereignty the * * * territory with all its rights and appurtenances." The United States received all the public lands, and the citizens were given U.S. citizenship. With respect to Alaska, the Russian Emperor ceded all the territory and dominions he possessed on the continent of America and adjacent islands, giving to the United States all rights, franchises, and privileges previously held by him. In neither case was any provision made for a continuing annuity or any sort of responsibilities or relationship after the sale.

But I see little point in a prolonged battle of words over sovereignty, for in my judgment it is almost irrelevant to the contemporary treaty issue. Even if we were sovereign in the zone, the political, military, and diplomatic arguments in favor of these treaties before us would remain the same. Sovereignty would add little to our position except possibly to give us a somewhat letter legal right to send 100,000 troops into the area, and still not be able to keep the canal functioning. It is simply not germane to our central purpose of keeping the canal open and available to all of us. Bill (William F.) Buckley (Jr.) fully supports the treaties, though he believes that "our title to the Panama Canal is morally and historically secure." But, Buckley goes on, even if we could prove that every Panamanian signed the treaty in 1903, the arguments for moving on to a new arrangement remain valid. I agree. The U.S. military and the commercial users of the canal—are interested in using it, and having that use guaranteed. Sovereignty is simply no longer a germane issue.

THE QUESTION OF WHETHER A TREATY WRITTEN TO BE SELF-EXECUTING CAN TRANSFER PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER DOMESTIC LAW WITHOUT IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

What this means in English is whether the House of Representatives must give its approval before these treaties—which do dispose of property—can be ratified. Article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the Constitution provides that Congress "shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." The argument has thus been made that this provision grants to both Houses of the Congress the power to dispose of Government property, that this power can be exercised only by statute, and that any treaty transferring property requires House concurrence. This is an enormously complex and disputed legal issue. Supreme court cases have been cited on both sides. I am sure that before this debate is concluded—I understand there are some amendments to be offered—we will all be quoting court citations. Still, I think there's a certain wisdom to the language of our committee's report:

While additional cases are cited on each side of the question, the Committee sees little merit in attempting to weigh dicta against dicta. The short of it is that the Court has never struck down a treaty for disposing of governmental property; that it has, over the years, had before it a number of treaties which did so; and that there is no reason to assume that Holden v. Joy supra, and Jones v. Meehan, supra do not represent the Courts thinking.

The committee then concludes:

The Committee finds that the Constitutional text, the intent of the Framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation.

In a word, the committee concluded that the Senate does have the right to dispose of the Panama Canal without reference to the House of Representatives.

Having said that, however, let me emphasize that the House will be very much involved in the implementing of the treaties. Among other things, both Houses will concur in the manner of setting up the Panama Canal Commission, how to set tolls, employment practices, adjustment of the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. Thus although I concur in the committee's judgment that the constitutional power to dispose of property by self-executing treaty is unassailable I look forward to the participation of the House of Representatives in the implementing stage.

COMPATIBILITY WITH OTHER TREATY COMMITMENTS

It has been argued, and I must confess that at first the idea bothered me, that the United States would not be able to invoke the provisions of article IV of the neutrality treaty because of a conflict with commitments made in other treaties. Specifically, I was concerned about what appeared to be specific injunctions against such action in the U.N. charter, and the OAS charter. Article 2, clause 4, of the U.N. charter, for example, provides that—

All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

Similarly, the OAS charter, article 18, provides that—

No state or group of states has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever in the internal or external affairs of any other state. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed forces but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the state or against its political, economic, and cultural elements.

The answer, it seems to me, lies in article IV itself, and in particular the Presidential statement, where it is specifically spelled out that any action the United States might take to maintain the regime of neutrality:

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal, affairs of Panama.

In a word, we would only assure that the canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and are not acting against the territorial integrity of political independence of Panama. The State Department specifically declared before the committee that there is no inconsistency:

A legitimate exercise of rights under the neutrality treaty, either in intent or in fact, be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

In short, so long as the United States would be doing nothing except keeping the canal open, we would not be in violation of the terms of these other treaties. I would add that the committee concurred in this judgment.

Let me make one other point regarding the validity of the treaties, particularly with reference to whether Panama must hold a second plebiscite because of the incorporation of the statement into the text. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties—article 46—provides, in regard to the provisions of internal law and their relationship to the treaties, that—

1. A state may not invoke the fact that its consent to be bound by a treaty has been expressed in violation of a provision of its internal law regarding competence to conclude treaties as invalidating its consent unless that violation was manifest and concerned a rule of its internal law of fundamental importance.

2. A violation is manifest if it would be objectively evident to any State conducting itself in the matter in accordance with normal practice and in good faith.

I am assured by legal opinion that given the publicity accorded the statement in Panama prior to the plebiscite, that there can be no question of the nonapplicability of the treaties.

THE NEXT AREA OF CONTROVERSY USUALLY COMES IN THREE PARTS: WHY SHOULD WE SIGN A TREATY WITH A (A) COMMUNIST (B) DICTATOR WHO (C) VIOLATES HUMAN RIGHTS

I would like to take each part separately.

To begin with, these treaties will not be between President Carter and General Torrijos, but between the Governments of the United States and Panama. General Torrijos most certainly will not be around when the treaty of neutrality goes into effect.

But there is an even more basic point than that: Panamanians of all political colorations are dissatisfied with the current canal arrangement. It is sometimes so easy to forget that there are "Panamanians," persons with minds and bodies and a national sensitivity. This is perhaps true of the American view of all of Latin America. I was struck most recently by the thoughts of Alastair Reid, writing in the New Yorker:

I have been perplexed for years by the vague view that most of the rest of the world has of Latin America, as though it were not a real place at all but, instead, a gigantic movie lot, with millions of available extras, of all shades and customs, ready to stage epics at the drop of a banana.

But there are real-life Panamanians, and they have been dissatisfied with the treaty from the start, when a French citizen exceeded his mandate and signed a treaty with the United States before any native Panamanian had a chance to read it, and while a Panamanian diplomatic team was on its way to Washington. The American Secretary of State Hay later wrote in a letter to Senator Spooner that the treaty was:

Vastly advantageous to the U.S., and we must confess, with what face we can muster, not so advantageous to Panama * * * You and I know too well how many points there are in this treaty to which a Panamanian patriot could object.

Well, Panamanian patriots have been protesting ever since—sometimes, as in 1964, violently. Demands for renegotiating the provisions which virtually created an American colony in the middle of their country predate Torrijos. For that matter, one of the more vociferous voices demanding change was that of the fascist President Arnulfo Arias back in the 1940's. Ambassador Bunker has pointed out that a truly democratic government in Panama would demand even better terms than we are giving Torrijos. In a word, whatever Panamanians may think of Torrijos, they are of one voice in demanding a change in the 1903 treaties. Indeed, the only real opposition to him on this issue comes from circles which believe that the treaties are too favorable to the United States.

Now, as for Torrijos' "Communism". This is just a spurious allegation. As Secretary Vance testified.

General Torrijos is not a Communist. There are no leading members of his government who are Communists.

The general did go to Cuba; but when he got back he said he was sure of one thing—that the Cuban system was not right for Panama. He has periodically exiled the leaders of a small Communist party, Partido del Pueblo. It plays no formal or informal role in the government. Panama maintains diplomatic relations with neither the Soviet Union or the Peoples Republic of China. A Soviet trade delegation did visit Panama last year, and there may be some modest expansion of commercial relations. But many Latin countries maintain trade ties with the Soviet Union, and it just is not any evidence at all that Torrijos is a Communist. For that matter, his cabinet is composed of generally very conservative individuals—his Minister of Planning is a Ph.D. under Milton Friedman of Chicago. As for Communist influence in Panama, virtually all of the experts questioned on this before our committee said that the quickest way to enhance Communist influence in Panama is to reject the treaties. The Communists in Panama, I might note, oppose the treaties. First of all, let me quote the Senator from South Carolina to the effect that—

Many of those now opposing a new treaty have more than once winked a knowing eye of regimes which are anything but Simonpure in their human rights practices.

Now as for his being a "dictator". I concede, Panama does not have, by the standards of the Senators in this body, a fully democratic government, and General Torrijos is not a properly elected president. But I submit that in Panamanian history there have been few democratically elected governments. The only difference is that during those decades when the sons of the Panama City social club were alternating in the Presidency they maintained a somewhat better facade on the system than Torrijos chooses to do. Furthermore, anybody who has seen Torrijos go out into the countryside and mingle with the people cannot help but acknowledge that he has a wide support. The man is a populist leader, with a grand social vision. Torrijos has by all accounts created a much fairer balance between the cities and the countryside in delivery of social services.

Certainly he exhibits none of the characteristics of dictators, say, in Uganda or Uruguay. The press, though not free by U.S. standards, is not as rigidly controlled as the press in Communist or totalitarian regimes. There is a limited amount of genuine press criticism. If you go down to Panama City and listen to the heated and open conversations in the restaurants, it is clear that the Torrijos regime is not what you might imagine.

Closely linked to the nature of the Panamanian Government is the issue of human rights. As might be expected, given my publicly expressed concern for human rights throughout the world, I have given considerable thought to the extent to which these treaties, by providing the Government of Panama with additional revenues, do in fact help perpetuate a regime charged in some quarters with violating human rights.

But here, again, I think this must be put into perspective. Without in any way attempting to condone the holding of political prisoners, or the forced exile of citizens. I think it is worth noting that Amnesty International did not find the situation in Panama serious enough to include in its 1975-76 report. In its earlier reports, Amnesty had concluded that the instances of gross violation of human rights ended about 1970. And Freedom House, frequently cited earlier for its critique of the situation in Panama, found substantial improvement—by the way Freedom House also found the paternalistic regime in the Canal Zone—only part free.

While we are discussing Freedom House, by the way, let me comment that despite its reservations about the human rights situation in Panama, the organization in its January-February 1978 publication Freedom at Issue, has strongly endorsed the treaties:

Without question, if these present Canal treaties are not ratified by the U.S. Senate, the immediate winners will be the communist parties of Latin America and the Caribbean. * * *

As an MCPL (Members of Congress for Peace Through Law) study noted:

The Panamanian Bishops' Conference has spoken out on human rights issues in Panama and in other parts of the world. It has also spoken on the Canal issue, strongly supporting the new Treaties. The Protestant and Jewish clergy also support the Treaties unequivocally. Neither Amnesty International, the International Commission of Jurists, the U.N. nor the O.A.S. has singled Panama out for condemnation. The situation in Panama is, in short, nowhere near constituting what Congress has defined as "a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights." This is not to say that the record is good. But it can be said that Panamanian citizens enjoy better living standards and lives freer from repression and official government terror than in many Latin American states.

Finally, in talks with Members of this body who visited Panama, General Torrijos according to the statement by our distinguished majority leader, pledged that steps would be taken to abrogate certain repressive laws, including those which had limited the right of assembly and had provided for summary trial and detention.

Nevertheless, there is still ground for concern; there are still measures we would like him to take. But in my judgment withholding ratification of these treaties is not the way to go about expressing our concerns. In our dealing with Panamá, as with South Africa or the Soviet Union, we must make judgments on how best to influence internal change. And in the case of Panama I think the steps General Torrijos has taken give every promise that as the economy improves and political tensions subside, further measures will be taken to end whatever remaining restrictions on human rights exist.

I personally feel, however, that there is a quite different aspect of human rights involved. Why should we lecture Panama on human rights violations, when in fact in the eyes of most Panamanians we are violating their basic human rights by holding on to the canal on terms which they feel are unbearable? I suspect that most Panamanians are more affected by the latter sort of infringement on human rights than on pressures from their government.

Just a word on whether we can trust Torrijos, or the Panamanians, or whether we must expect that they will try to abrogate the treaties as soon as they are in control. To begin with, he would have no right to take over by force during the period prior to 2000. The internationally recognized power of nationalization has never applied to property of another foreign government, and the Canal Commission which will run the canal during this period will be an entity of the United States. Could he take it by force? Certainly not during that period, for the United States will retain sufficient forces to defend the canal, and can reinforce these in case of greater threats. But I really doubt Panama would even try. Despite the profoundest dissatisfactions with the old treaty, Panama has never tried to abrogate it. Instead, Panama has patiently negotiated for 13 years.

As for the situation after the end of the century, Panama will take over the canal, but as a trustee, restrained in its actions by obligations agreed to, aware that in case these obligations are denied, the United States can take such measures as are necessary. I do not believe in threats. I do not even think threats will be necessary. After all, a normal and profitable operation of the canal will be in Panama's highest interest. But from the standpoint of U.S. national security it is clear that the United States retains a unilateral right to defend the regime of neutrality—in perpetuity.

As a matter of fact, this right in perpetuity—precisely the aspect of the 1903 treaty which was such an irritant to Panamanians—demonstrates for me what a really balanced and fair treaty we have achieved here. The neutrality treaty provides that Panama can permit no foreign military presence there after we leave in the year 2000. That goes beyond even the 1903 treaty, which has no such clause; Panama right now has every right to have Soviet and Cuban troops lined up along the boundaries of the Canal Zone.

One final word about the stability of the Panamanian regime. Much has been made by critics of the statistical fact that Panama has had 60 governments in about 70 years and that only four Presidents ever completed their 4-year term in office. How, they ask, can we deal with a country like that? Well, the fact is this figure includes the number of times in which Vice-Presidents have been sworn in as acting Presidents while the Presidents were traveling overseas—something required by the Panamanian Constitution. In fact, Panama, particularly in recent years, has been as stable as most Western countries. Since 1946, for instance, Panama has had 13 governments; but in the same time Italy has had 39 governments, France had 34 premiers, the United Kingdom had 9 Prime Ministers and the United States had 6 Presidents. Torrijos has been in office while we have had three Presidents. And a final point: To the degree that there is political instability in Panama, it is often the result of our occupying the Canal Zone.

THE SEA LEVEL CANAL CONTROVERSY

It must confess that of all the disputed issues in these treaties, the debate over article XII of the neutrality treaty relating to a sea-level canal is the most curious. The article provides that the United States will not conclude an agreement with any other country in Central America to build a sea-level canal in the period before the year 2000. But it also provides that Panama will not build a canal in Panama without us. Now, the fact of the matter is that any sea-level canal if built—and I think most economists say it will never be built—would certainly be built in Panama. A U.S. commission spent 5 years and $22 million before concluding in 1970 that of 34 possible routes, only 8 were worth looking at, and of these the two best by a huge margin were in Panama. The route in Nicaragua is 140 miles long; the one in Columbia is 100 miles long; the path through Panama is 40 miles long. Construction costs would reflect the distance. Even the cheapest route at the time was projected at $2.8 billion; and that has climbed to $6 or $7 billion today. The other routes in neighboring countries would cost at least four times as much. These conclusions were reconfirmed by the Department of Transportation which reviewed the Eisenhower study in 1977. The judgment that Nicaragua was simply unacceptable as an alternative route was so persuasive that when that country requested the abrogation of a treaty (Bryan-Chamorro) which gave us this exclusive right, the Senate approved—66 to 5—of the change. Many of the Senators now opposed to the sea-level canal provisions with Panama renounced the Nicaragua route rights 6 years ago.

So what this clause does is commit the United States not to build a sea-level canal where it would not in any case, in exchange for a Panamanian guarantee not to build a sea-level canal with any other nation—the Saudis, the Japanese, Brazil. The clause went into the treaty at our insistence General Torrijos would be delighted to take it out. I say that is very much in the U.S. interest to keep it in.

WITH RESPECT TO THE MILITARY VALUE OF THE CANAL

I am satisfied that the committee has, through testimony of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, defined the contemporary value of the canal to U.S. defense needs. The members—Gen. George Brown, the chairman; Gen. Bernard Rogers, Chief of Staff of the Army; Adm. James Holloway, Chief of Naval operations; Gen. David Jones, Chief of Staff of the Air Force, and Gen. Lewis Wilson, Commandant of the Marine Corps—were unanimous in describing the canal as an important element in our defense operations. General Brown, told us:

The Joint Chiefs of Staff recognize the Panama Canal as a major defense asset, the use of which enhances United States capability for timely reinforcement of the United States forces. The strategic military value of the canal is reflected in our ability to accelerate the shift of military forces and logistic support by sea between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans.

The strategic value of the canal is not expected to change substantially throughout the life of the new Panama Canal treaty.

However, while recognizing the canal as an important factor in our defense system, many qualifications were attached which diminish substantially its overall importance. Planes and missiles have obviously changed fundamentally the canal's vulnerability in wartime. In time of war, as Admiral Holloway's statement explained, the canal would certainly be put out of the importance of the canal in relative terms is therefore substantially diminished. In a word, it would be destroyed in the first minutes. The 13 aircraft carriers on active duty cannot transit the canal; it is argued that the Navy will be returning to smaller carriers, but at the moment any carrier big enough to handle modern jet planes would be too large for the canal. In practice, the primary role of the canal would be to permit logistical support between oceans. Even during the Vietnam war, when canal usage went up dramatically, there was never any crisis. For that matter, only 20 percent of U.S. ships to Vietnam transited the canal.

In my judgment, the bottom line was given by Adm. Robert Long, Vice Chief of Naval Operations, declared that the loss of the canal "would not be a fatal flaw in the ability to execute our war plans." That is exactly how I view the canal.

In a word, important; but not vital. And, as the Chiefs themselves argued, the best way to keep the canal available to the United States is by a cooperative agreement with the Panamanians. In general, the internal threat to the canal, that is, from Panamanian patriots dissatisfied with our current arrangements, is far greater than that from the outside. And it will take these treaties to persuade the Panamanians that they should have any real interest in protection of the canal.

WITH RESPECT TO THE ECONOMIC PROVISION OF THE TREATIES

As a Senator from Iowa, I have two primary economic interests in these treaties:

That they not burden further the taxpayers of my State;

And that they assure the farmers of my State a reliable, dependable means of shipping grain to the Far East, at an economical cost.

The first of my considerations relates directly to the allegations that we are paying the Panamanians to take the canal, and actually involves two considerations: Are we giving away U.S. property, and will taxpayers have to foot the bill to pay Panama in the future.

It is true, Mr. President, that we are "giving" away some U.S. property; but what we are giving in no way correlates to the figures charged by the critics. Over the course of the next 22 years the United States will turn over to Panama the lands and waters, the building and facilities, now in the zone. There are three ways of reckoning how much this is worth. The initial investment was about $1.6 billion, on which the United States recovered all but $58 million. The replacement value—a figure of no particular pertinence as far as I can see—because who would build another lock canal—is perhaps $8 billion. The book value, because of depreciation, is now only about $620 million. Measured against the fact we left $5 billion worth of material in Vietnam we climbed aboard our helicopters for the pullout, this does not seem all that much.

But there is an even more important way of measuring this value. The canal has always been run by the United States with the intent of subsidizing shippers, not Panama. Tolls began at $1.20 in 1914 and are still only $1.29. Based on 1914 dollars, the payments today are only a fraction of what they should be. Nobody can in good faith argue that Panama has benefited to the degree that it should have.

Let me turn to the "payments" to Panama under the new treaty. Here, too, there has been considerable misunderstanding and misreading of the treaty provisions. The Senator from South Carolina said in his testimony before the committee that—

We oblige ourselves to pay the Panama government huge sums in various ways, totalling up to nearly $1.5 billion over the next 22 years.

Let us be clear in our minds: All payments to Panama throughout the life of the treaty derive from revenues of the canal. There is no obligation for the taxpayers to pay anything. The $10 million for services; the $10 million annuity; and the $0.30 a canal ton for transit, all derive from revenues accruing to the Canal Commission.

Having said that, let me grant that this whole turnover will in fact cost the U.S. taxpayer something. I suspect that the annual $20 million in interest paid by the old Canal Zone Company—but only since 1950—will cease—by congressional action. Pentagon officials say that the consolidation of the military bases will cost about $50 million—but General McAuliffe told us this would have taken place in any case, with or without the treaties. I think it is important to concede that these are indeed costs arising from the transfer; but they are really minimal compared to what we pay worldwide. We pay Greece and Turkey and Spain far more annually for base rights.

Furthermore, even in the economic package we are discussing with Panama—which though not technically a part of the treaties is certainly linked—there would be virtually no demand on the U.S. Treasury. The single exception is 10 percent of the $50 million credits for arms sales which has to be deposited, but which historically has never been taken up. With that minor exception it can be stated flatly that neither the treaties nor the economic package which accompanies it calls for any additional appropriation from the U.S. Treasury. There is no additional burden on the U.S. taxpayer. What the treaty actually does is give Panama a far greater economic incentive to keep the canal open and operating, and that is in the interest of all of us.

With respect to the economic considerations of the canal treaty allow me to cite some testimony before our committee that I found particularly revealing. United Brands Co. is the largest single user of the Panama Canal. In 1977 alone their vessels transited the canal nearly 400 times, and they paid some $3 million in canal tolls and charges. It also acted as agents for vessels that made an additional 513 transits. United Brands knows Panama. Its ships supplied material and labor for the canal's construction. It has an enormous economic interest in the future of the canal.

And yet its president and chief executive officer, Seymour Milstein, told our committee:

We are convinced that ratification of the Panama Canal treaties is the only fair conclusion to the good faith negotiations conducted by our two countries over the last several years.

And this from the largest single user with the greatest interest in efficient and safe operation of the canal of any U.S. concern.

Mr. Milstein made a couple of other pertinent observations:

Without more direct long term experience in Panama than any other U.S. corporation, we have dealt extensively and for many years with the leaders of the government of Panama. We can tell you that when the government of Panama took over the schools and hospitals which United Brands had previously operated, there was no deterioration in the quality of education and health care services provided to the Panamanian people. We have always been treated fairly by the administration and courts and, as an example, during a recent labor dispute involving our company, the Panamanian judicial system ruled fairly and equitably in the matter. We have been given the kind of treatment in Panama that accords with our expectations as free Americans.

Let me turn to my second point on the economic considerations. Iowa farmers ship a lot of grain to the Far East, and it is vital that the transport costs not increase significantly. According to calculations of all the best economists we could muster, the projected 30-percent increase in tolls would have a minor impact on overall shipping costs. As Ambassador Bunker said in a speech in Des Moines:

The transportation cost of a bushel of grain shipped to Japan from Des Moines which now averages 66 cents, would increase by less than half a cent.

This is an additional 20 to 30 cents per long ton, and a very small fraction of the overall transportation costs from New Orleans to Japan. Col. Lawrence Jackley, a native of Des Moines and for some time a member of the Pentagon team that worked on the treaties, said in Des Moines—

The impact of that on the total costs of transportation is very minor. The impact on the consumer is even less, even if the consumer picked up all of the raise.

Transportation costs for a Toyota or Datsun would go up by only about $3.

As Jackley pointed out, the impact of shipping costs of political turmoil would be far greater, and insurance rates as well.

In a word, the economic impact on the Iowa farmer will be minimal, and in any case less than it will be if political dislocations threaten safe and secure transport through the canal. For that matter let us not overstate the economic value of the canal to the United States as a whole. It is true that the canal reduces the nautical distance between east and west coast ports by 8,000 miles. But most of our internal commerce does not flow that way. The oft-cited figure of 70 percent of canal cargoes originating in, or destined for, U.S. ports, represents a mere 16 percent of our total ocean traffic. The fact is that the canal, in economic terms, is of far greater importance to 10 other countries.

Foreign trade accounts for less than 10 percent of the U.S. gross national product, and therefore the canal affects less than 1 percent of the U.S. GNP. As Robert G. Cox, a canal authority, wrote:

By volume, less than 5 percent of the total world trade transits the Panama Canal. By value, the proportion would be little more than one percent.

The U.S. ships more goods by airplane than go through the canal.

Cox adds:

As for the $700 million in actual unrecovered investments the U.S. government would have had that back by now had it not elected to subsidize the shipping operations of user nations through reductions in real toll charges while demand for transit service was increasing.

I think the committee report emphasized the proper issue:

The Panama Canal Treaty will protect the major U.S. economic interest by insuring that the Canal will remain open and will be run efficiently.

Providing, as I discussed, this does not come at too great a cost, and I do not think it will, this is an enormous benefit for the Iowa farmer.

WHAT THE TREATIES DO NOT DO

Before summarizing my thoughts on the treaties, I would like to make clear that I have very clearly in my mind the complexities of what we are involved in, and the limitations thereon. These treaties are the product of an extremely lengthy and complex political negotiation, derived into a large extent on the political situation in both of our countries. They are not, and I would not pretend to argue the case, the final delineation of our relationship. They are not totally satisfying to me; nor are they to General Torrijos. They do not answer every question about our future relations. There are legitimate questions about the future economic viability of the canal. They do not anticipate every military threat or situation affecting the canal. They do not, as the committee report emphasized, remake the Government of Panama in our own image; they do not guarantee an acceptable human rights situation in Panama; they do not prevent drug smuggling from Panama; they do not guarantee the exclusion of Communists or Cubans from Panama.

But, then, in fact we could never have expected that they would. The conclusion of these treaties was in fact a negotiation, a two-way tug of war about our national interests. I could image a treaty more acceptable to us, and more favorable to our interests. But to be successful, to be enduring, a treaty must reflect the basic interests of both parties involved. And that is what I think these treaties before us have achieved.

CONCLUSION

I am afraid that a point I should like to make in beginning my conclusion might be a bit of a surprise. Let me state it, and then explain it. In my judgment, the furor over the Panama Canal is far out of relationship to its importance to this Nation.

The Panama Canal is both economically and militarily of significance for the United States. But the fact is that in both respects, it is important, but not vital.

Economically, there are a variety of alternate means of shipment. That is why the toll structure is so sensitive—a marginal increase in tolls makes all sorts of optional methods competitive. Actually, as you know, there have been fewer transits each year, and for 3 years the canal ran a deficit. There are 2,000 commercial supertankers and cargo ships too large to transit the canal. While U.S. traffic is important to Panama—two-thirds of their revenue—these are only 10 percent of the U.S. oceangoing traffic. For the Iowa farmer, it would not make a great deal of difference whether his grain goes to Japan through the canal or by rail to the west coast. A former member of the Board of Directors of the Panama Canal Company, Dr. John C. Elac, has described the impact of the closing of the canal on total United States and world trade as “inconsequential.”

Similarly, the military importance of the canal is diminishing. I repeat the conclusion of Admiral Long, who declared that loss of the canal “would not be a fatal flaw in the ability to exercise our war plans.”

But the reason I say, I feel the Panama issue had been exaggerated beyond its importance is based only partially on the conviction that the canal is of less than vital economic and military significance. My basic reason was that I can find so many other international issues which ultimately are going to affect the lives of each person here in a way far more profound than the Panama Canal. Among these are: The threat of nuclear holocaust; the necessity of coming to grips with global poverty; the challenge of world consumption of energy; the dangers to our environment; and the difficulties of achieving democratic regimes throughout the world, and struggling for a recognition of human rights.

Measured against these issues, frankly, the Panama Canal looms pretty small. It was a great achievement, the "moonwalk" of the decade. The U.S. record of operation of the canal is incredible. But the times have changed. We have before us a pair of documents which describe a new relationship. The Panal Canal treaty spells out a reasonable and intelligent 22-year process for preparing Panama to run the canal. The treaty of neutrality provides us assurances that if Panama ignores this sacred trust, or any other nation threatens its neutrality, we can take such action necessary—in perpetuity. If the concern is guaranteed use of the canal, then these treaties as amended will be in my judgment the most effective way of action on this job.

Let me say in closing, guaranteed use of the canal is not all these treaties accomplish. They, in the broader perspective, also as former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger put it, provide "an opportunity to advance fundamental American foreign policy interests." Secretary of State Cyrus Vance put it another way:

Any nation's foreign policy is based, in the end, not just upon its interests, and in Panama our interests are clear and apparent. It is also based on the nature and will of its people. I believe the American people want to live in peace with their neighbors, want to be strong, but to use their strength with restraint, want all peoples everywhere to have their own chance to better themselves and to live in self respect. That is all a part of our American tradition.

It was in the Monroe Doctrine tradition of the time that Theodore Roosevelt as he put in his own words "took Panama." It is in the American tradition of today that we look forward to a new, and ultimately stronger relationship with Panama which guarantees our mutual interest in a prosperous canal.

As Roosevelt himself once said:

The important thing is the next step. It often happens that the good conditions of the past can be regained not by going back, but by going forward. We cannot recreate what is dead; we cannot stop the march of events; but we can direct this march and out of the conditions develop something better than the past knew.

That, I submit, is the solemn trust and responsibility we now share in the Senate: To go forward, not backward, and to develop something better than the past that Roosevelt knew. I think that is what these treaties achieve.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the canal may continue for an additional 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Clark). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise to express some concern over a situation that came to my attention just today. It is, I think, with regard to the Panama Canal Treaty, a situation that could be worked on some over this legislative break of 1 week. It involves at least two companies, I have been advised, that have expropriation proceedings underway for which they are seeking recompense from the Panamanian Government at the present time.

Their properties were expropriated, and adequate settlement has not been made up until this time. The procedure, as I understand it, is that in cases like this the State Department convenes an interagency committee which determines the validity of the expropriation claim and then decides what to do about it with the Panamanian Government. This interagency committee, I have been told today, meets next week.

I wish to express my concern that these expropriation matters be made a matter of high priority in the State Department and with the Panamanian Government so that they can be fully and adequately resolved before the treaty is signed.

I share the concerns of the companies involved that if such disposition of these cases is not made prior to signing of the treaty their chances might obviously be diminished as far as getting just compensation for expropriated property.

So, Mr. President, I hope that, with this being published in the Record of today's proceedings, the State Department will move as expeditiously as possible to get these matters resolved. I hope, also, that the Panamanian Government will cooperate to the fullest extent in seeing that this does get resolved so that this does not become a matter which we have to bring up closer to the date on which we might be voting on the treaty.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS SUBMITTED

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, two questions are before the Senate as we consider these treaties. The first is whether or not the just national interest of the United States is best served by our giving up sovereign control of the canal. The second question is whether or not these treaties adequately protect vital American rights if we decide to give the canal to Panama.

Those who favor giving up the canal claim that American control of the canal is the cause of great resentment throughout Latin America. They say that it is an affront to the Panamanian dignity for them to pass through a foreign zone to get from one part of their country to another. I might point out that for an American to get to Alaska, he must drive through Canada. Yet few of us lie awake nights scheming to take British Columbia.

Few Americans view the world with the crippling sense of guilt that so hampers our foreign policy establishment. Let us examine the history of our involvement in Panama.

With justifiable pride and great sense of accomplishment the United States opened the Panama Canal in 1914. The dream of Columbus had been realized. The canal was universally acclaimed as an engineering marvel. It was the moonshot of its day. Where all others had failed, Yankee ingenuity and perseverance succeeded. Under American jurisdiction the canal has operated efficiently and fairly for the benefit of all nations. It is today an international waterway freely available to all world shipping. Nearly 15,000 vessels of all nations go through the canal annually. The tolls are kept low and all income is used for maintenance and improvements in the canal. Panama, a country which owes its very existence to America's willingness to build the canal, has benefited enormously from this project. American taxpayers have an investment of $6 billion in the canal and its military installations. The fact that Panama has one of the highest per capita incomes in Latin America is almost solely the result of our canal.

Emotional tirades about yankee imperialism cannot be allowed to obscure the fact the U.S. control of the Panama Canal is at once a service to world trade and vital to our own national security. Recently four former Chiefs of Naval Operations wrote the following to President Carter:

Our experience has been that as each crisis developed during our active service—World War II, Korea, Vietnam and the Cuban missile crises—the value of the Canal was forcefully emphasized by emergency transits of our naval units and massive logistic support for the Armed Forces. The Canal provided operational flexibility and rapid mobility. In addition, there are the psychological advantages of this power potential. As Commander-in-Chief, you will find the ownership and sovereign control of the Canal indispensable during periods of tension and conflict.

The record of political instability in Panama can hardly engender confidence in their ability to defend the canal. During the last 70 years their government changed hands 50 times—mostly by force. At the moment, Panama is governed by a left-wing dictator whose trademark is anti-U.S. sloganeering. Under his rule, Panama's indebtedness has grown from $167 million to $1.5 billion. Freedom House, a respected organization which works for human rights, has listed Panama under the Torrijos regime as one of the "least free" nations on Earth. Far from stabilizing the situation in the area, a transfer of sovereignty over the canal to Panama would set up this tiny country with a combat force of only 1,600 as an irresistibly tempting target for Communist subversion.

Rather than give away the Panama Canal we should be seeking a positive approach toward helping the Panamanian people solve the problems of the area. Modernizing and improving the present lock system and the possibility of a new sea level canal are exciting projects which would do far more for the people of Panama than the Yankee-go-home demagoguery of the present regime. While I favor retaining sovereignty, I would be willing to make major changes in the present operation to increase the benefits the Panamanians derive from the canal. But if we decide to give up sovereign control of the canal, if we turn over to a tiny country a secure, multibillion dollar facility over which we now exercise all the attributes of sovereignty we have, it seems to me, a perfect right to insist on, in exchange, a clear cut and unambiguous legal right to protect our just interest in this canal. The two treaties do not provide these rights. From the day the treaties were signed, Americans and Panamanians have put a markedly different interpretation on key provisions of the treaty. For example, the Torrijos-Carter understanding of last October is claimed by our spokesman to give us the right to take action against any threat to the canal—even a threat from Panama. Maximum Leader Torrijos, however, told his people that it merely says that if Panama summons us, we will come to the defense of the Canal. He said:

We ring the bell * * * and the U.S. comes.

Clearly, these treaties do not represent any agreement. They represent an attempt to paper over serious differences. There are numerous vague and ambiguous provisions in the treaties which, far from ushering in an era of good feeling between the United States and Panama, will insure periods of friction, of probing and testing, of conflicts in which one side or the other must back down or resort to force. I believe the most reasonable course for us to follow is to reject these treaties and go back to the negotiating table. It is far better to resolve these issues through peaceful negotiations than to hide from the difficult questions in the hope that they will disappear. Wishful thinking is the easy course, but it is the most dangerous course. I do not accept the argument that the Panamanians will not allow our rights to be spelled out clearly and unmistakably in the treaties but that they will not object to our actual exercise of those rights. For these reasons I intend to oppose the treaties before the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, earlier today during the course of my remarks on the Panama Canal Treaty, I mentioned the Trilateral Commission. On January 19, 1977, I placed a discussion of this Commission in the Record together with a list of its members. As I said on the floor this morning, I am not arguing about the patriotism or loyalty of these members. My concern is, and I think you will find this concern substantiated, what is the true purpose of the Commission and its continuing efforts to change the monetary system of the world? In fact, they suggest changes regardless of whether they are good or not for the United States. I believe that this whole subject should be aired and should be discussed thoroughly so that the American people will know exactly the purposes of this Commission. This becomes, to me, vitally important, because an updated list of the membership will carry many members of the Carter administration and Members of the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that this excerpt from the Record be again printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, of late, we have been hearing more and more of the Trilateral Commission. It seems that nearly every member of the Carter administration is a member of this body and also many of our colleagues in the Senate and the House. It was inaugurated in 1973 and it is an organization of private citizens from Japan, Western Europe, and North America who come together to discuss matters of common concern. Papers are published on their findings and we find their areas of interest diversified, but I would say mainly in the fields of economics. Because there has been the attention drawn to this commission by the members of the Carter administration, including the President-elect himself, I thought that my colleagues in the Congress would like to know more about this group, so I have assembled some information about it. The Washington Post of last Sunday evidenced a bit of interest in this organization and published a rather lengthy article on it, and I ask unanimous consent that all of these matters be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION

At its meeting in Ottawa on May 10 and 11, 1976, the Trilateral Commission discussed reports by two of its task forces concerned with international institutional problems. Following its discussion, the commission urged the trilateral governments to take steps to promote reform of international economic institutions and to improve international consultative processes. The task force report, "The Reform of International Institutions," was, in particular, another indication of the recognition by the commission that the renovation of the international system is a task of global as well as trilateral dimensions.

Perhaps no statement more aptly captures the spirit of the Trilateral Commission's work than the speech of its director. Zbigniew Brzezinski, to commission members in Kyoto in mid-1975. Looking back, Mr. Brzezinski noted that when the commission was being assembled, "We were very much aware of the difficulties we were then confronting in our own trilateral relations. We were concerned at that time over the prospect our relations might fragment, that our three regions might be moved by the dynamic of events into more hostile relationships * * *". As this decade has proceeded, however, it has become clear that the strains and shifts in the international system are global as well as trilateral in scope. "I see, in the emerging world, our three regions still representing the more cooperative, the more vital center * * *". But I would argue that the focus of much of this [trilateral effort] must be on the fashioning of a more just and equitable world order. In other words, the focus must not be on the preservation of the status quo, but arrangements which increasingly co-opt and embrace the Third and Fourth Worlds in a cooperative endeavor."

BACKGROUND

Inaugurated in 1973, the Trilateral Commission is an organization of well-known private citizens from Japan, Western Europe, and North America who come together to discuss matters of common concern. Its approximately 200 members are drawn from a broad range of occupations—from academics and politicians to businessmen, labor leaders, and ex-government officials. The initiative to set up the commission flowed from the conviction that private citizens with international interests could contribute to building a new consensus among the "trilateral" regions on more cooperative ways of tackling international problems. Underlying this conviction was a belief that in the world of the 1970's and 1980's the advanced industrial democracies could make a major contribution in all spheres, perhaps particularly to the world's economic development, but that their full potential could only be realized if they evolved stronger habits of working together through both governmental and nongovernmental channels. The commission aimed, by developing a process of intensive trilateral discussion and study to make a practical contribution to this end.

Each regional group of the commission is led by a chairman. Gerald S. Smith, formerly Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, is North American Chairman; George Berthoin, formerly Chief Representative of the Commission of the European Communities in London, recently succeeded Max Kohnstamm, Director of the European University Institute, as Chairman of the European Group; and Takeshi Watanabe, former President of the Asian Development Bank, is Japanese Chairman. The commission's director during its first 3 years has been Zbigniew Brzezinski, director of the Research Institute on International Change at Columbia University. In addition to the regional chairmen, there is an executive committee composed of some 30 members representative of the larger commission. Particular policy areas are generally tackled through task forces composed of commission members as well as of experts outside the commission.

Of the original members of the commission, several have been called to government service since its inception. Among these are, in the United States, Secretary of Commerce Elliot Richardson and Secretary of Transportation William Coleman; in Japan, Foreign Minister Kichi Miyazawa; and in Europe, French Prime Minister Raymond Barre, British Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Evan Luard, and Danish Minister of Foreign Economic Affairs Ivor Norgaard.

In furtherance of its aim of nurturing habits of working together among the trilateral regions, the commission has held six main trilateral meetings in its first 3-year lifespan, completed on June 30, 1976. The next meeting of the commission will be held in Japan in January 1977.

TASK FORCES AND REPORTS

From the outset, the commission has been a policy-oriented organization. The reports of its task forces, all the products of an extensive process of discussion with experts in the three regions, have emphasized shared perspectives and agreed recommendations. As the "Economist" put it: "The men organising the commission * * * want to bring about action, and hence they want the new body to be a marriage of the intellectual and the influential."¹ In this spirit, the commission has consistently urged practical measures to reform the international economic system and to avert possible confrontations, particularly in relations between the developed and the developing worlds.

Twelve reports from trilateral task forces established by the commission have been published, and a number of others are in various stages of preparation.

Most of the completed task force reports, written by academics, ex-government officials, or others, represent policy-oriented efforts to come to grips with key current problems of what might be called the "global political economy." The first commission report, completed in October 1973, dealt with the disarray of the international monetary system. Two reports from the task force on relations with developing countries, in 1974 and 1975; focused on major aspects of a "turning point in North-South economic relations." Other subjects covered have ranged from trade, energy, and commodities issues to the reform of international institutions, the oceans, and the prospects for democracy in the advanced industrial societies of the trilateral regions.

In addition, the commission has taken up issues of topical importance without commissioning special reports on them. The question of international business ethics was discussed at the May 1976 meeting in Ottawa, and earlier meetings dealt with such issues as the Middle East and the political implications of inflation.

In the most recent phase of its work, the commission has studied the institutional problems faced by the trilateral countries and the wider world community in their efforts to tackle current international problems. Two trilateral task forces were commissioned to study these problems—one on the need for the reform of international economic institutions, and one on the problem of intergovernmental consultations. As mentioned earlier, the two reports were discussed at the commission's meeting in Ottawa in May 1976 and published thereafter.

Following its discussion, the commission adopted a statement embodying a program of institutional reform which it urged governments to adopt. The salient elements of this program are:

1. The strengthening of existing institutions. This would include negotiating a new set of rules and rights on export controls within the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; greater use of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development for the coordination of macroeconomic policies; new rules in the International Monetary Fund to achieve effective multilateral surveillance of the international monetary system; and a greater coordinating role for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in economic development affairs, to the extent of introducing a new annual "world development budget" exercise.

2. The creation of new institutions to meet new needs, particularly on the issue of international investment and for the management of certain ocean problems.

3. The improvement of mechanisms for informal consultation between governments, including the possibility of creating a new trilateral consultative mechanism modeled on the European political cooperation machinery (formerly called the Davignon Committee).

The statement recognized that institutional reform cannot in itself solve the world's problems. But the commission believes that strong institutions, with a structure and membership flexible enough to reflect changing priorities and new patterns of influence, can help minimize international friction and disagreements, while also contributing to an international system which is more stable and fair. Such institutions are certainly an essential element of any attempt to find more cooperative approaches for dealing with common problems.

THE NEXT 3 YEARS

The commission recently decided to extend its work for a period of 3 years starting in July 1976. During that period, it will pursue many of the themes of its initial phase. In particular, North-South issues will remain high on its agenda, with a new study being commissioned on food problems in the developing world. It will also pursue the general line of inquiry begun in the controversial study, "The Crisis of Democracy," by Michel Crozier, Samuel Huntington, and Joji Watanuki, by means of a new report on the changing relationships between labor, management, and governments in advanced industrial democracies. The commission has two projects in hand on relations with Communist countries—one on how these countries can be more constructively involved in tackling such global problems as food, energy, and economic development; the other, an overview of current problems in East-West relations. No less important, however, the commission will continue to take up issues of topical importance without commissioning special report on them.

The lifespan of the commission thus far has been considerable change in the state of relations between the countries represented on it. The commission believes that the process of closer cooperation begun shortly after the Arab/Israeli war of 1973 and the sudden rise in oil prices which followed has resulted in an increasingly widespread acceptance of what might be called the "trilateral idea"—the idea that the advanced industrial countries have common responsibilities and common problems in the current international situation.

These problems and responsibilities dictate an unprecedented effort of cooperation between governments and in the private sector both within the trilateral regions and between the trilateral countries and the rest of the world. The commission further believes that by developing specific, policy-oriented proposals for the consideration of governments and private citizens concerned about international problems, it can continue to make a significant contribution to this effort.

THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION

[A Private North American-European-Japanese Initiative on Matters of Common Concern]

ORGANIZATION AND POLICY PROGRAM

The Commission is composed of about two hundred individuals from the three regions. From this larger group is drawn the Executive Committee, including the Regional Chairmen and twenty-nine other individuals—nine from Japan, eight from the United States, one from Canada, and eleven from the various countries of the European Community and Norway. Twice each year the full Commission or its Executive Committee gathers in one of the regions. The Executive Committee last met in Paris in December 1975. Plenary meetings of the Commission were held in Kyoto in May 1975 and are scheduled for Ottawa in May 1976.

A major portion of each semi-annual meeting is devoted to consideration of reports from Commission task forces. Task force work is at the center of the Policy Program of the Commission. At the core of each task force are rapporteurs from each of the three regions. In the course of their work the rapporteurs are likely to draw on a wide range of consultants, including Commission members and others. The final stage for each task force, before publication of its report, is discussion of the report by the full Commission or its Executive Committee. The Commission or Executive Committee may then use the reports in issuing recommendations of its own, as has been done on a number of occasions. Nine task force reports have been published so far, and five others are in various stages of preparation.

In addition to its task force reports, the Commission has also followed other subjects on a more topical basis, by means of presentations and briefings at its meetings. Subjects covered have included the social and political implications of inflation, financial aspects of the oil crisis, and prospects for peace in the Middle East.

*("The Commission) will hope to demonstrate through the more flexible actions of private citizens that more progress can be made on * * * emerging common problems by working on them together than by trying to deal separately with the consequences of nationalistic mistakes." *("The Kyoto meeting) was a remarkable cross section of the interlocking establishments of the world's leading industrialized nations. * * * Because it is primarily concerned with the affairs of the world's most prosperous nations, critics have sometimes dismissed the Trilateral Commission as simply "a rich man's club." * *  (That made all the more extraordinary the theme which loomed largest in the discussions at Kyoto. Time and again, speakers from a dozen nations came back to the same point: somehow the present international system must be changed so as to accommodate the increasingly insistent demands of the poor nations for a greater share of the world's wealth. * * * (The movers and shakers gathered in Kyoto had found themselves largely in agreement in their diagnosis of the world's central political problem. As a group, they were in a rare position to press this diagnosis on the world's policymakers. And diagnosis, after all, is a necessary preliminary to any cure." TRILATERAL COMMISSION TASK FORCES

Nine Commission task force reports have been published so far. Five other reports are in various stages of preparation.

1. Towards a renovated world monetary system (1973)

The rapporteurs of the Trilateral Monetary Task Force were Richard N. Cooper, Professor of Economics at Yale University, Motoo Kaji, Professor of Economics at the University of Tokyo, and Claudio Segre, formerly with the Commission of the European Communities and the Lazard Bank in Paris. The task force recommended a number of long-term reforms and interim government measures to restore order and stability to the international monetary system. The postwar monetary system had broken down in the monetary crisis of 1971 and the outlines of a new system were not clear. One of the task force recommendations, the coordinated sale of official gold into private markets and use of the resulting "capital gains" for development assistance, is being partially realized in plans underway for sale of a portion of the gold holdings of the IMF.

2. The crisis of international cooperation (1973)

In broad strokes, the Trilateral Political Task Force sketched the main political, economic and social trends effecting a transformation of the postwar international system. The report sought to clarify the present historical situation, and supplies an underlying rationale for trilateral cooperation. "If collective action were to fail in this crucial area of interdependence, what confidence could there be that it would succeed in others where links are more tenuous?" Francois Duchene, now Director of the Centre for Contemporary European Studies at the University of Sussex, was the European rapporteur of this task force. The Japanese rapporteur was Kinshide Mushakoji. Director of the Institute of International Relations at Sophia University in Tokyo. The North American was Henry D. Owen, Director of Foreign Policy Studies at the Brookings Institution.

3. A turning point in north-south economic relations (1974)

7. OPEC, the triallateral world, and the developing countries: new arrangements for cooperation, 1976-1980 (1975)

Both of these reports were produced by the Trilateral Task Force on Relations with Developing Countries, the rapporteurs of which were Richard N. Gardner, Professor of Law and International Organization at Columbia University, Saburo Okita, President of the Overseas Economic Cooperation Fund, and B. J. Udink, Former Dutch Minister for Aid to the Developing Countries. The first report was written in the wake of the sharp rise in the price of oil and climbing costs of food and other vital imports of developing countries. According, the task force addressed the critical question of how the trilateral nations, along with the oil-exporting countries, could best help those poorer developing countries most severely affected by these developments in the world economy. In particular, the task force recommended that trilateral and OPEC countries make available $3 billion in extra concessional aid in 1974-75 for these countries of the "Fourth World," with each group providing half and hopefully with participation of the Soviet Union as well. At a broader level, the task force set forth principles for a general restructuring of North-South economic relations. In its second report, the task force looked somewhat farther ahead, to the end of this decade. The rapporteurs recommended that a "Third Window" be opened in World Bank which would annually provide $3 billion in concessional loans in 1976-80. Funds would be borrowed by the Bank and lent at concessional rates made possible by interest subsidy funds provided mostly by governments. A scaled-down version of the Third Window proposal has now been adopted by the World Bank. To encourage the participation of the OPEC countries in the regular activities of the Bank and IMF, the rapporteurs recommended that the quotas and voting rights of these states in both institutions be raised from the existing 5% of the total to between 15 and 20%. Negotiations in the IMF over quotas and voting rights have resulted in a doubling of OPEC country shares in that organization, to about 10% of the total.

4. Directions for world trade in the nineteen-seventies (1974)

The Trilateral Task Force on Trade set forth cooperative approaches to main issues before the current GATT round of multilateral trade negotiations, which were seen as quite relevant to present economic difficulties and as a valuable opportunity to strengthen an important structure of multilateral cooperation. Successful negotiation of the wide range of issues which should be involved in the current round, it was noted, would require substantial additions to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The task force recommended these be incorporated in a supplementary code open to all but operated only by those parties subscribing to it. Rapporteurs of this task force were Guido Colonna di Paliano, a former member of the Commission of the European Communities, Philip H. Trezise, former Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, and Nobuhiko Ushiba, former Ambassador of Japan to the United States.

5. Energy: The Imperative for a Trilateral Approach (1974)

6. Energy: A Strategy for International Action (1974)

Both of these reports were prepared by the Trilateral Task Force on the Political and International Implications of the Energy Crisis. The first sets out general aspects of the problem and general directions for policy. The second is more specific in outlining action on the problem so far and recommending policy lines which should be pursued by the trilateral countries. The task force recommends a broad, positive approach to the oil-exporters, without isolating the issue of price. Meanwhile, the trilateral countries must cooperate to maintain their financial health in the face of existing oil prices and to establish arrangements for sharing energy in any future emergency resulting from cutoffs of Arab oil supplies. For the medium term, through 1985, the trilateral countries must start now to work toward reductions of their dependence on uncertain external energy sources. For the much longer term, to the end of this century, the trilateral countries should move now to outline cooperative research and development efforts, anticipating the end of the hydrocarbon age. While not pessimistic about the long-term future, the task force sees a transitional period of extraordinary difficulty and adjustment ahead as trilateral societies adapt to insecure, expensive, perhaps reduced energy supplies, and to slower economic growth. It is a real question whether the necessary sacrifices will in fact be accepted by powerful elements in the body politic. Countries must remain sensitive to each other's problems and agree on sharing burdens and shortages. The rapporteurs of this task force were John C. Campbell, Senior Research Fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, Guy de Carmoy, Professor at the European Institute of Business Administration in Fontainebleau, and Shinichi Kondo, former Ambassador of Japan to Canada.

8. The crisis of democracy (1975)

This book-length study, published by New York University Press, is the report of the Trilateral Task Force on the Governability of Democracies. The authors are Michel Crozier, Director of the Centre de Sociologie des Organisations in Paris, Samuel P. Huntington, Professor of Government at Harvard University, and Joji Watanuki, Professor of Sociology at Sophia University in Tokyo. After a long period of rather steady progress, the democratic political systems of the trilateral regions have entered a more difficult and uncertain phase, particularly in Europe and the United States. The demands on democratic government have grown, while the capacity of democratic government seems to have shrunk. The authors seek to analyze the historical situation in each of the regions, and offer some general conclusions. Chapters on Western Europe, the United States, and Japan by individual authors are surrounded by a common introduction and conclusion, and appendices presenting discussion of the report in the Commission.

9. A new regime for the oceans (1975)

Against the background of continuing negotiations in the UN Law of the Sea Conference and a global perspective on critical oceans issues, this task force advances a number of recommendations aimed primarily at improving international ocean management and balancing the distributional consequences of the emerging oceans regime of 200-mile economic zones for coastal states. The rapporteurs of this task force are Michael Hardy, Ann L. Hollick, Johan Jorgen Holst, Douglas M. Johnston, and Shigeru Oda. Hardy is a Legal Adviser to the Commission of the European Communities; Hollick is Executive Director of the Ocean Policy Project at the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University; Holst is Director of Research at the Norwegian Institute of International Affairs; Johnston is Professor of Law at Dalhousie University; Oda is Professor of International Law at Tohoku University.

10. Commodities issues (final report due in early 1976)

The task force will define the complex issues involved in the problems of commodity supplies and outline the political and economic framework within which these issues should be tackled. The rapporteurs of this task force are Carl E. Beigie, Executive Director of the C. D. Howe Research Institute, Wolfgang Hager of the Research Institute of the German Society for Foreign Policy, and Sueo Sekiguchi, Senior Staff Economist at the Japan Economic Research Center.

11. International institutions (final report due in mid-1976)

Against the background of the post-World War II experience of international institution-building and the lessons to be learned from that experience, the task force will offer recommendations for new or reformed institutional arrangements and rules to cope with current problems, and for ways all such institutions can be most effectively mobilized. The rapporteurs of this task force are C. Fred Bergsten, Senior Fellow at the Brookings Institution, George Berthoin, former Chief Representative of the Commission of the European Community in the United Kingdom, and Kinhide Mushakoji, Professor of International Relations at Sophia University in Tokyo.

12. Trilateral consultative procedure (final report due in mid-1976)

The task force will consider ways of improving trilateral consultation against the background of an increasingly interdependent world in which the domestic and international dimensions of economic problems are more and more interrelated. The rapporteurs are Egidio Ortona, J. Robert Schaetzel, and Nobuhiko Ushiba. Ortona was Ambassador of Italy to the United States; Schaetzel was Ambassador of the United States to the European Community; Ushiba was Ambassador of Japan to the United States.

13. Constructive global involvement of the Communist countries (final report due in early 1977)

The involvement of the U.S.S.R., the Communist countries of Eastern Europe, and China could contribute to tackling certain global problems and, at the same time, assist in the improvement of East-West relations. The task force will study a number of key issues in this light. Chihiro Hosoya, Henry Owen and Andrew Shonfield are the rapporteurs of this task force. Hosoya is Professor of International Relations at Hitotsubashi University; Owen is Director of Foreign Policy Studies at the Brookings Institution; Shonfield is Director of the Royal Institute of International Affairs.

14. The renovated international system (final report due in early 1977)

Drawing on the work of earlier trilateral task forces, this report will provide a framework for interpreting the challenges faced by the existing international order and offer guidelines for policies which will encourage the emergence of a renovated system. Rapporteurs for the project are Richard N. Cooper, Karl Kaiser and Masataka Kohsaka. Cooper is Professor of Economics at Yale University; Kaiser is Director of the Research Institute of the German Society for Foreign Policy; and Kohsaka is Professor of Law at Kyoto University.

TREATY CONCERNING THE PER-MANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

TREATY CONCERNING THE PERMANENT NEUTRALITY AND OPERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st Session, treaty concerning the permanent neutrality and operation of the Panama Canal.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. Allen) is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for recognizing me at this time, and I thank the distinguished majority leader (Mr. Robert C. Byrd) for arranging last week that I might be recognized first when the treaties were to be laid before the Senate today. I appreciate, too, the attitude of the joint leadership (Mr. Robert C. Byrd and Mr. Baker) in recognizing that this is one of the most important issues to come before the U.S. Senate in recent years, and that it is entitled to full debate and the opportunity to offer constructive substantive amendments to the treaties.

My opposition to approval by the Senate—that is, that the Senate give its advice and consent to the ratification of the treaties—is not a position as I have come to only recently, in recent weeks or in recent months. Each month since I have come to the U.S. Senate I have sent back to the people of Alabama a report of my position on the issues, my vote, my stand, and my activities in the U.S. Senate. I find, looking back, that in my newsletter of October 1971 I stated my position on the Panama Canal Treaty, thinking at that time it would be one treaty embodying all of the provisions agreed upon by the negotiators. The position that I arrived at in October 1971, some 5 years before Governor Reagan discovered this issue, was a position in opposition to the Panama Canal Treaty, that is, a treaty which would give the Panama Canal to Panama, I worded my statement at that time as follows:

"No" ON GIVING UP PANAMA CANAL

The Nixon Administration is currently negotiating with the Republic of Panama for a new treaty respecting the operation, management and defense of the Panama Canal. The proposed new treaty would replace the present treaty which has been in effect since 1903. Under consideration are proposals to surrender sovereignty over the Canal to Panama, raise transit tolls, subject the Canal facility to joint defense, management and control, and eventually give up Panama both the existing Canal and any new one constructed in Panama at the expense of our taxpayers. Panama is holding out for a provision that would remove U.S. defensive forces. It has long been a Soviet aim to wrest control of the Panama Canal from us. With Cuba, Bolivia, Peru, and now Chile, already dominated by Communist power, the rest of Latin America could then soon be under Soviet control. Surrender of United States sovereignty over the Panama Canal will be vigorously opposed by me.

Mr. President, I could write the very same statement of my position today as I had back in October 1971 by merely striking out "Chile" and the words "Nixon administration" and substituting in lieu thereof the words "Carter administration." Just as I opposed the treaties which were being negotiated under President Nixon, so do I now oppose the treaties which have been negotiated under President Carter.

Mr. President, the President of the United States sent the two treaties to the Senate last year during the 1st session of the 95th Congress. He sent up, quite naturally and quite logically, the Panama Canal Treaty first in executive N. so-called, followed second by the neutrality treaty, also part of executive N. That, of course, would be a logical and sensible order in which to submit the treaties, because the Panama Canal Treaty provides for a transfer of the canal to Panama, and the circumstances under which the canal will be so transferred. The other treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, in practical effect provides for the defense of the canal starting with the year 2000.

So why, Mr. President, should the Senate be considering the matter of the neutrality of the canal starting with the next century without first deciding whether we are going to give the canal away?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer that question?

Mr. ALLEN. The distinguished Senator has been so gracious in yielding to other Senators that, whereas I would like to be able to complete my remarks, I will certainly not refuse to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator is very kind to yield, and I apologize for interrupting him at this point. May I just state that it was the viewpoint of the leadership and the viewpoint of the committee in reporting the Neutrality Treaty first to the Senate that logically Senators should vote on that treaty before voting on the Panama Canal Treaty. The Panama Canal Treaty would relinquish U.S. control over the canal by the year 2000, and the leadership recognizes that most Senators would not want to vote on the treaty relinquishing control of the canal in the year 2000 without first establishing, beyond any doubt whatsoever, the right of the United States to guarantee access to and use of that canal after the year 2000 in perpetuity, and also to establish the fact beyond any semblance of doubt that U.S. war vessels, in times of need or emergency, would go to the head of the line.

As I look at this question as an individual Senator, I personally would want to know what is going to happen after the year 2000 before I vote on a treaty relinquishing U.S. control by the year 2000. That was the logic of the committee and the leadership's position, may I say to my good friend from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his attempt to justify the consideration, first, of the Neutrality Treaty rather than the Panama Canal Treaty. The distinguished Senator knows, of course, that if we were considering the Panama Canal Treaty, it would be quite easy to add an amendment that the treaty, even though approved, would not go into effect until the Neutrality Treaty had been agreed to.

At the latest count, this amendment has some 78 cosponsors, the Senator now speaking being one of them. Even if we did not put in a saving clause, this Canal Treaty, in practice, would not go into effect until the Neutrality Treaty is approved. We would be perfectly safe, even without a saving clause, in doing this because the 78 votes would be sufficient to approve the treaty. So if that is what he is worried about, it will protect him.

Also, I would like to call attention to the fact that article IV of the Panama Canal Treaty is just about as strong a provision for the defense of the canal as the so-called leadership amendment. A little bit later on, and I will not say just how soon, during the course of my remarks I will discuss the leadership amendment. It adds practically nothing to the concept of the United States having the right to defend the canal. I feel, in explanation to our distinguished majority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, that the Panama Canal Treaty should be considered first. I stated in the early days of the debate that at the appropriate time I would make a motion here in the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty. I feel this is a function, a proper function, of the leadership, to schedule the legislation or the executive business coming before the Senate in its proper order. There has been no objection to the leadership calling up the Panama Canal treaties at this time, but I do believe that the Senate itself should decide the order in which these treaties are to be considered. First things should be first. We should not put the cart before the horse. We should decide first whether it is going to be our national policy to surrender the Panama Canal to the Republic of Panama, and whether we shall give them hundreds of millions of dollars, if not in fact billions of dollars, for taking the canal off our hands.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator in referring to that treaty implies it does not go into effect until the year 2000. As a matter of fact, the instrument of ratification of the Neutrality Treaty would be exchanged at the same time as the instrument ratification of the treaty concerning the Panama Canal. Both treaties would go into effect at the same time.

I would further say to the Senator that the Senate leadership has put before the Senate the Neutrality Treaty, and the Senate leadership has scheduled debate on that treaty which, under that proposal, would go into effect at the same time as the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. Of course, the treaty does go into effect at the same time as the Panama Canal Treaty, but the chief function that it would have, inasmuch as the United States until the year 2000 is charged with the primary defense of the canal, is found in the fact that the Neutrality Treaty applies mainly to the time when all U.S. troops would be removed from the Canal Zone. That is the main thrust of the treaty, because under the Panama Canal Treaty the United States does have the primary responsibility of defending the canal.

Under the Panama Canal Treaty and the signed agreements which have been entered into, our number of bases there in the Canal Zone, designed to protect and defend the canal, immediately on the approval of the Panama Canal Treaty are cut from 14 down to 4. But then starting with the year 2000, unless an amendment I have prepared is agreed to, prior to the start of the next century, the United States is required to withdraw all of its troops from Panama. We will not have a single soldier there defending the canal starting with the year 2000.

If we are going to give the canal away and pull all of our soldiers out, we certainly need some sort of treaty which will give us some sort of rights after year 2000.

Later on I am going to point out how the so-called leadership amendment does not protect the vital interests of the United States in seeing that the canal is defended.

Mr. President, all of us have an interest in the Panama Canal, this great engineering feat, possibly the greatest of all times. There was, as I understand it, more cubic feet of dirt removed than the cubic footage in the pyramids. It was a great engineering accomplishment made by the genius of America after the French had failed in their attempt to build a canal.

People of some States possibly have a great interest in the canal because of special contributions made by the people of their particular State. I noted with great interest when the distinguished majority leader quoting from Mr. David McCullough's book, "The Path Between the Seas." He read of the very fine contribution made by the State of West Virginia in the construction of the canal. This is found in the Record of February 9, 1978.

Among the more fascinating facts about the Panama Canal, for example, is that all hardware for the lock gates—the lifting mechanisms for the stem valves, the special bearings, gears and struts in the gate machines, all 92 bull wheels—was made by a single manufacturer in Wheeling, West Virginia.

That was certainly a very fine contribution made by the people of West Virginia in the construction of the canal.

I wish I were able to point out some contribution made by the people of Alabama and the State of Alabama in the actual, physical construction of the canal. I am not able to do that, but I am able to point with pride to the contribution made by three great Alabamians in connection with the concept of the canal and the execution of the plans and the dreams from the Panama Canal.

Senator John T. Morgan, of Alabama, one of Alabama's great U.S. Senators, who served in the U.S. Senate from 1877 to 1907, was called, and properly, the father of the Isthmian Canal. General—or doctor, if you will—William Crawford Gorgas was the doctor in charge of the medical facilities, the health programs, in Panama and in the Canal Zone. He is credited, and properly, with having wiped out yellow fever there, in the Canal Zone, which was one of the real causes of de Lesseps' inability and failure to complete the Panama Canal that he tried heroically to build.

The people thought that the fever came from the swamps, and that was the best medical opinion at the time. But Dr. William Crawford Gorgas of Alabama had the idea—it was not original with him, but it had been advanced, and he put into effect a plan to wipe out the mosquitoes in Panama——

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN (continuing). A plan that did make a great contribution to the building of the canal.

In just one moment, I shall yield to the distinguished Senator.

Then Gen. William L. Sibert—he was later general and then, colonel—was Colonel Geothals' righthand man in the building of the Gatun locks. These great Alabamians made a great contribution to the building of the canal. I am certainly proud of the fact that Alabama, by the contribution of these three great leaders, possibly contributed more to the building of the canal than people of any other State, with the possible exception of New York State, which was the home of President Teddy Roosevelt.

Yes, I am now glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I appreciate that very much.

My distinguished colleague from Alabama, a few moments ago, mentioned the figure that I have had referred to me previously in Illinois in the last 8 days on a number of occasions, as I have discussed the Panama Canal Treaty from one end of my State to the other. I should like to accurately report that there are many people who are applauding the efforts of the distinguished Senator from Alabama to bring out many of these facts. Some of the concerns he has expressed are genuine concerns, that are shared by many of us, including citizens in Illinois.

One point that was raised with me, however, is, Why is it necessary for us to reduce our bases there up until the year 2000? The amendment that I cosponsored with the majority and minority leaders and other of our colleagues would still continue, after the year 2000, the right for this country unilaterally to intervene militarily, so long as we do not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama, any time the canal is endangered—that is clear. But why do we have to cut our number of bases down in the meantime so much?

The distinguished Senator from Alabama did mention the figure that we were cutting our bases, from 14 to 4. Will he permit me just 2 minutes to read a section here in the testimony of General McAuliffe, whom many of us met, as the U.S. commander in chief for the U.S. Sovereign Command? We happened to fly back with him to Washington. We spent a great deal of time talking about this. He confirmed these facts.

He said in his testimony:

First, I wish to clarify the land areas available for defense purposes, since there has been considerable confusion about the number of military bases we now have in the Canal Zone, and those that will be available to the U.S. forces in the new treaty period. On several occasions, as an example, I have seen and heard statements to the effect that there are now 14 U.S. bases in the Zone, but that there will be only four left under the 1977 treaties. I know of no good foundation for either one of those figures—neither is correct. By actual count, there are 22 identifiable U.S. military reservations in the Canal Zone, most of them in active use, some inactive. However, they are administratively grouped in the Code of Federal Regulations into four; one per military service and one for my joint headquarters.

In my judgment, the number of bases is far less important than their adequacy to support of our forces and missions.

One can see from the two maps—

That he was demonstrating in committee at the time—that the size of the base areas in red would be somewhat reduced under the new treaties. As the military commander, I can assure you that the reduction is not significant in terms of supporting U.S. forces and our mission accomplishment.

I talked to no one in our military establishments—Joint Chiefs of Staff or those in the Southern Command—who did not feel that, up until the year 2000, we have perfectly adequate facilities in Panama to protect, at any time, the Panama Canal against the kind of threat that we might possibly envision.

They always raised the question whether any degree of protection is available against a sabotage or terrorist activity, which can strike at almost any time, day or night, and which cannot always be guarded against. But so far as the major military threat against the base, I was assured when I came back, I want to tell my distinguished colleague from Alabama, that we are providing adequately in the bases. The four bases really do not constitute a cutdown from 22 or 14 to 4. It is simply a regrouping of them and is perfectly adequate for the defense of the canal.

Does my distinguished colleague have any different information that would lead him to believe that what we were told by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Southern Command was inaccurate?

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for his comments. One of the arguments, as I understand it, that is made by the proponents of the treaties is that the canal is indefensible. That being true, one would think that 14 bases—U.S. soldiers and marines in 14 bases could come nearer defending the canal than could American forces in four bases. But four is not the bottom line, because, under the side agreements that are made, that we do not have an opportunity even to vote on here in the Senate, according to the response of the distinguished Vice President (Mr. Mondale) to my parliamentary inquiry—under the side agreements, every 2 years they consider whether they are going to cut down from four with no right to come back in except with Panamanian approval. So it is possible that, long before 2000, we shall not have any bases there at all. If we do not need 22 bases there and just need 4, why have we kept them there all this while? This is something I cannot understand.

Obviously, it would be easier to defend now from 22 bases than from 4 bases.

The distinguished Senator has put his finger on the Achilles heel of the leadership amendment, the amendment that seeks to provide a defense of the canal after all of our forces have been withdrawn.

Is the amendment overlooks the fact—and the Senate or, as well, overlooked the fact—that all of our troops will have been withdrawn from Panama by the year 2000. So, when this Neutrality Treaty comes into full play, into full operation, we will not have any military presence there at all. It will all be gone.

If we think it is necessary to come in and defend the canal, we are going to have to come in as invaders. We are going to have to drop paratroopers.

The amendment that I am going to offer at the proper time—and right now, as I understand it, we are discussing the whole concept of the Panama Canal treaties and not necessarily discussing any particular article—will be an amendment to article I of the Neutrality Treaty, or the Panama Canal Treaty, depending on which one is before the Senate at that time, to add, in addition to what is already provided in article I, this proviso, that the military presence of the United States shall continue beyond December 31, 1999, if the President of the United States deems that it is necessary for the defense of the canal or for the maintenance of its neutrality, and so certifies to the Government of Panama prior to December 31, 1999.

Now, with that amendment we would have the military presence of the United States continue beyond the year 2000 if the President of the United States deems that it is necessary to do so prior to December 31, 1999, and so certifies to the Government of Panama, because without that amendment either as an amendment to article I or to the leadership amendment, so-called, without that amendment we are not going to have any soldiers in Panama come the year 2000. But with the amendment, our country has the option and the President of the United States has the option, acting on behalf of the people of the United States, to say that our military presence is needed in the Canal Zone to defend the canal or to maintain its neutrality.

The statement has been made that the last three or four Presidents have favored the Panama Canal treaties, and possibly they have. So I assume that the President of the United States, whoever he might be along about the year 1999, if he did not sincerely feel that it was necessary for us to maintain our military presence there in Panama, he would not deem it necessary and would not so certify to the Government of Panama.

But it does retain an option on behalf of the people of the United States, if our military presence is required there after the year 2000. Thus, prior to the lapse of the Panama Canal Treaty which will, in effect, lapse by the year 2000, it retains in the United States the option of the President to say that our troops are needed here to defend the canal.

We do not know what the situation is going to be in the year 2000. Is there any prophet here who is able to say what the governmental status of Panama will be in the year 2000?

We do not know what it will be tomorrow, much less the year 2000.

[Mr. Church addressed the Chair.]

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senate wait until I complete my thought?

Panama might be a Cuban satellite, it might be a Soviet satellite. I think we can certainly expect Castro, just as soon as the ink is dry on the Presidential ratification of these treaties, if they are ratified, to tell us to get out of Guantanamo. I dare say he would have just about as good a right to ask us to get out of our naval base in Cuba as Panama has to tell us to get out of the Canal Zone.

So are we taking on ourselves the role of prophets under the leadership amendment, under the treaties, that we are going to have a stable government down there in Panama and that they are going to be our friends? That is what the treaties and the leadership amendment presuppose.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church).

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator from Alabama very much.

The point that he makes, that none of us can prophesy the future, of course, is self-evident.

I would point out to him, however, that the committee's recommended amendment go to the question of the security of the canal in the future, reserving to the United States the right to use its military forces to protect the canal against any threat that might be posed to it, whether external or internal.

If the Senate sees fit to adopt the recommended amendment, it seems to me that the vital interest the United States has in maintaining an open, neutral, safe waterway across the isthmus will be fully protected.

If, for example, at the end of the century a situation should exist in Panama as described by the able Senator from Alabama and the President perceived a threat to the canal, internal in character, then under the terms of the amendment it would be fully within the President's authority to use American military might to keep the canal safe and open.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I am glad to hear the Senator say that, and I quote "it would be fully within the President's authority to retain troops for the purpose of keeping the canal safe and open" and, that being true, I am sure he will not object to agreeing to my amendment, if his amendment means that.

Mr. CHURCH. That being true, the Senator's amendment is superfluous and, therefore, unnecessary.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for his admission that this is needed, this interpretation is needed; and why rely on an interpretation that might not be the interpretation of Dictator Torrijos when we can put it in plain English language?

I do not know what the final result will be in the Spanish language.

Now, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico asked that I yield to him a moment ago. If he still wishes me to do so, I will, and then I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. Curtis).

Mr. SCHMITT. The Senator from New Mexico appreciates the Senator's courtesy.

I just wanted to add my general concurrence and sympathy with the remarks of the Senator with respect to the so-called leadership amendment, having to do with the right of this country to intervene to protect the neutrality of the canal.

As a cosponsor of that leadership amendment, I should make clear that I am a cosponsor only because it slightly improves two treaties that are inherently bad, primarily because they are bilateral and it only requires one party to break such a treaty. I am not sponsoring those amendments with any great confidence that they would allow us, in fact, in a real situation, faced with the real fact, which the Senator from Alabama is pointing out to us this morning, to intervene militarily.

I greet with some interest the suggestion by the Senator from Alabama for a more specific amendment that would deal with the question of the ability to intervene, which is what I believe the Senator is getting to.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. SCHMITT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I might state, parenthetically, in response to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico (Mr. Schmitt), that I, too, am a cosponsor of the so-called leadership amendment. I am a cosponsor on the same theory as the distinguished Senator from New Mexico—that it might just possibly improve the treaties. The improvement is very slight, indeed, but since such a furor has been made about the leadership amendment, that it solves all the ills of the treaty and from then on we will be fully protected—since that idea seems to be prevalent in some minds, I did not want to seem to be in opposition to that amendment.

Also, for the further reason, I say to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, that being a cosponsor of the amendment allows me to point out its weaknesses, its defects, its failure to go far enough. I feel that, being a cosponsor of this amendment, I would have a perfect right to point out its shortcomings, which are many, and I am going to comment as soon as I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. Curtis) for another short comment or two.

I now yield for a question to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank my distinguished friend.

Is it true that there has not been an election in Panama since 1968?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe that is correct. There has not been one since Torrijos engineered what we might call a coup d'etat.

Mr. CURTIS. Can the Senator from Alabama say why they do not have an election?

Mr. ALLEN. Because they have a dictator there who does not like free elections, I say to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Is there anything in the leadership amendment that would hold this treaty in abeyance until such time as the Panamanians are in charge of their own government?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I looked with great interest for such provision but was unable to find it.

I might say, further, that I talked to one of the Senators who went to Panama. I did not go this current round to Panama. But I will have to confess, however, that I did on one occasion visit Panama, at Government expense, back in 1943, in the U.S. Navy. Our ship moved from the Atlantic to the Pacific on the way to fight Japan, and I did travel the canal at that time. But that was prior to Mr. Torrijos' coup d'etat in Panama.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the Senator's opinion that the adoption of the leadership amendment would cure the major objections to the treaty?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I am quite certain it would not. It is just a little tempest in a teapot. It amounts to practically nothing. But it has been built up as being a cure-all for the many defects of the treaty. It does not even touch the real defects, and certainly in the area that it addresses, it falls far short.

In line with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) a moment ago, since that is the intent of the leadership amendment, that we should be able to keep forces there beyond the year 2000, I would like to get that fact written into the amendment they offer, so there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. CURTIS. Is there a difference between an amendment that improves the treaty and an amendment that just makes it more palatable to Senators and the public generally?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, of course, the strategy, as I understand it, of the proponents, is that the original treaties, as entered into, signed by the President and Dictator Torrijos, created such an uproar and were so deficient in not providing for the rights of the United States to defend the canal, that the President and Torrijos entered into an unsigned memorandum to calm troubled waters.

Torrijos straight away placed a different interpretation on it from that which the distinguished Senator from Idaho seems to place on the leadership amendment, which is, of course, an amendment based on the memorandum.

The Senator knows that when Torrijos went back to Panama, after having agreed to this unsigned memorandum, he made the statement that he did not sign anything in Washington, that he did not even sign an autograph. He said that he would construe that memorandum, which is now the leadership amendment, in effect, to mean that it did not give the United States the right to come down and defend the canal. It gave us the duty to do so when—to use his words originally in Spanish, I assume—when he pressed the button. That is the way Torrijos interprets the memorandum which, in effect, is now the leadership amendment.

So if Torrijos has one interpretation placed upon the language of the memorandum, which is now the leadership amendment, then I think we should spell it out, we should spell out that we can keep your military presence there if the President at that time—at the time of the complete pullout—feels that complete withdrawal would not permit us properly to defend the canal.

I feel this added amendment, this added power, should be spelled out, so that there will not be any doubt in Mr. Torrijos' mind about what the language means.

Mr. CURTIS. In reference to the Torrijos interpretation of what he signed here and what was agreed to, has that been made a matter of record before the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. Made a matter of record where?

Mr. CURTIS. Made a matter of record so that it is now before the Senate in any of our documents.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. Last year, I made 24 speeches on the floor of the Senate pointing out some of the defects in the treaty. In one of those speeches, I pointed it out. It is in the Congressional Record.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. The distinguished Senator from Idaho was on his feet first, and I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan in just a moment.

Mr. CHURCH. I wonder whether the able Senator from Alabama will yield to me for the purpose of inserting in the Record the relevant language of the amendment, together with the committee's interpretation of the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[The material ordered to be printed in the Record is as follows:]

A. AMENDMENT INCORPORATING IN ARTICLE IV OF THE NEUTRALITY TREATY THE RIGHTS OF DEFENSE SET FORTH IN CARTER-TORRIJOS JOINT STATEMENT

The Committee recommends that article IV of the Neutrality Treaty be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

A correct and authoritative statement of certain rights and duties of the Parties under the foregoing is contained in the Statement of Understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on October 14, 1977, and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on October 18, 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this Treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

"This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

STATEMENT OF INTENT

The Committee's intent in recommending the adoption of these two amendments to the Neutrality Treaty is that the Carter-Torrijos Joint Statement of October 14, 1977, be made an integral part of the treaty with the same force and effect as those treaty provisions submitted to the Senate initially for its advice and consent.

The Committee had originally voted to include the Joint Statement in a single amendment which would have added as a new article IX to the treaty. Upon being advised by the State Department—contrary to previous advice—that this placement could require a new Panamanian plebiscite, the Committee voted to reconsider the proposed article IX and voted instead to recommend the addition of that same material, in two parts, to articles IV and VI. This did not represent a "flip-flop"; in each instance the substantive wording was identical to that of the Joint Statement, and each provision—whether placed in one article or in two—would have had precisely the same legal effect, being equally binding internationally. The difference is purely one of cosmetics. If a negligible change in form, with no change whatsoever in substance, could obviate the need for a new plebiscite—an eventuality which could complicate vastly the ratification process—then the Committee concluded that it would happily oblige.

The meaning of these amendments, which together constitute the entire Joint Statement, is plain. The first amendment relates to the right of the United States to defend the Canal. (It creates no automatic obligation to do so. See p. 74 of this report.) It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however the Canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the Canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. When such steps shall be taken is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act if it deems proper against any threat to the Canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or non-military. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty. They do not terminate.

The above-described rights are not affected by the second paragraph of the amendment, which provides that the United States has no "right of intervention . . . in the internal affairs of Panama", and which prohibits the United States from acting "against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama." The Committee notes, first, that these provisions prohibit the United States from doing nothing that it is not already prohibited from doing under the United Nations Charter, which proscribes "the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state" (article 2(4)). The Committee never supposed that the United States, in entering into the Neutrality Treaty, intended to obtain powers that it had previously renounced. The Committee thus does not believe that the provision in question substantively alters existing United States commitments to Panama.

Second, the prohibitions set forth in the second paragraph do not derogate from the rights conferred in the first. The Joint Statement recognizes that the use of Panamanian territory might be required to defend the Canal. But that use would be for the sole purpose of defending the Canal—it would be purely incidental to the Canal's defense; it would be strictly a means to that end, rather than an end in itself; and it would not be carried out for the purpose of taking Panamanian territory. The concepts of the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama are, in short, an integral part of the treaty, so that action directed at preserving the regime of neutrality set forth in the treaty would never be directed against Panama's territorial integrity or political independence.

For these reasons, use of Panamanian territory to defend the Canal would clearly be permissible under the portion of the Joint Statement incorporated in Article IV. This is made clear in an opinion presented to the Committee by the Department of Justice (hearings, part 1, p. 332):

"A legitimate exercise of rights under the Neutrality Treaty by the United States would not, either in intent or in fact, be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama. No question of detaching territory from the sovereignty or jurisdiction of Panama would arise. Nor would the political independence of Panama be violated by measures calculated to uphold a commitment to the maintenance of the Canal's neutrality which Panama has freely assumed. A use of force in these circumstances would not be directed against the form or character or composition of the Government of Panama or any other aspect of its political independence; it would be solely directed and proportionately crafted to maintain the neutrality of the Canal."

Finally, even if a conflict were somehow to arise between the two paragraphs, because the United States has the right to act against "any * * * threat directed against the Canal", there is no question that the first would prevail. The rights conferred therein are stated in absolute terms and must therefore be construed as controlling.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator wish to ask a question predicated upon that insertion?

Mr. CHURCH. First, I would like to refer to the insertion, and then I may or may not have a question.

Mr. ALLEN. All right.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the language of this amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. ALLEN. I am yielding only for a question, because otherwise I would lose my right to the floor.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Alabama not lose his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield for 3 minutes under those conditions.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. President, the actual language of the amendment which would be written directly into the text of the treaties is based upon the language of the communicate agreed upon by the two Presidents. The language speaks for itself, and it is as follows:

The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and consequently shall have the right to act against aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

If the Senate adopts this amendment that language will be written directly into the text of the treaty.

Furthermore, the Panamanian Government will have to sign off on the amended treaty at the time the instrument of ratification is filed. As a result, there will be no question that the United States has the right to intervene militarily in the event the canal is ever threatened.

This is what the Committee on Foreign Relations has to say about that language:

It allows the United States to introduce its Armed Forces into Panama whenever and however the canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. When such steps shall be taken is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act as it deems proper against any threat to the canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or nonmilitary. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty and they do not terminate.

With all respect for the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Alabama, I do not see how language different from the amendment recommended to the Senate in the committee report could make more explicit or more definite the rights reserved to the United States. And the committee language, of course, is the same language that has been incorporated into the amendment introduced by Senators Byrd and Baker, the majority and minority leaders, respectively. It conforms to the language of the communique agreed upon by both Presidents, and it would be riveted into the treaty.

I just think that unless the Senator can show me some way to improve upon that language his amendment is totally unnecessary and superfluous.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. I will point out to him that what the Foreign Relations Committee says this means is not binding upon Dictator Torrijos who says it means something entirely different, and I will point out again to the distinguished Senator from Idaho—I sought to do so a moment ago—that his amendment overlooks the fact that these rights given to the United States subsequent to the year 2000 are rights given after all of our troops have been withdrawn. It is a right to invade Panama. They would give us that right but rob us of the means because by that time all of our troops will have been withdrawn from the canal and any of our intervention will be in the nature of an invasion of Panama.

Further, the leadership amendment has been offered herein for the Record by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, but he did not read out loud the last paragraph of the amendment which says that in no event will these rights under the leadership amendment be construed to authorize the United States to interfere with the internal affairs of Panama. Panama might be the very entity that is seeking to keep us from using the canal. Panama might be under the control of Castro or some like dictator, and they will be the ones who are preventing us from using the canal. But yet we could not interfere with the internal affairs of the canal under the treaty.

So certainly if we invaded the country that would be interfering with the internal affairs of Panama.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I yield at this time to the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin).

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized for 3 minutes without the Senator from Alabama losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Alabama. Although he is a cosponsor of the so-called leadership amendment, he is pointing out some of its serious shortcomings. He is absolutely right, and I am not going to support the so-called leadership amendment for some reasons that I would like to talk about.

First of all, I will not support it because the representatives of the two countries, the United States and Panama, do not agree on what it means.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Second, because our interpretation would constitute a substantive change in the treaty, I feel very strongly that such a substantive change should be submitted to approval by the people of Panama. I have no confidence that, even if Mr. Torrijos personally agrees to something that we do, we can have any assurance that in the years down the road we are going to have a meaningful agreement with Panama.

And does the Senator from Alabama know—as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I, of course, am familiar with the exercise that went on, and I think it is important at this particular point in the debate to call attention to it—but is he aware of the fact that the so-called leadership amendment at one stage in the deliberations of the Committee on Foreign Relations was to be adopted as a new article of the Neutrality Treaty? Indeed, it had been approved by a vote of the committee. Then, however, we received word from the State Department overnight that Mr. Torrijos would consider that, if we were to leave it as a separate amendment to the treaty, it would have to be submitted to the people of Panama in a plebiscite for approval; but if we divided the amendment in two, and tacked one part of it on one article and tacked another part of it on another article, then he was not going to submit it to the people of Panama for their approval—despite the fact that the words were exactly the same. How ridiculous can we get?

As a result of that, the Committee on Foreign Relations did a flip-flop and reconsidered their adoption of the leadership amendment which is, in effect, almost word-for-word the so-called Torrijos-Carter understanding, of October 14. They did a flip-flop. They struck out the amendment as it was adopted and divided the language up, putting one part of it on one article and one part of it on another, in order that it would not be submitted to the people of Panama for a plebiscite.

As far as I am concerned that is a major reason why I would not vote for the amendment—because we have notice in advance that it will not be submitted to the people of Panama for approval.

Now, then, I would like to say a word in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska about whether or not these differences of interpretation are in the record. I would like, if I might, to direct him and others who are interested to that portion of my statement of minority views which begins on page 183 of the committee's report. You will find there a rather lengthy documentation of the conflicting interpretation by spokesmen for the two governments.

Let me just focus, for example, upon a statement made by the chief Panamanian negotiator, Dr. Romulo Escobar. He said that—

The neutrality pact does not provide that the United States will say when neutrality is violated. That is not provided there. There is an article which reads that Panama and the United States will maintain the neutrality pact with the purpose that the canal remain open peacefully for all ships of all flags of the world.

That is all it says. It does not say it falls to the United States to decide when neutrality is violated or not.

[Mr. McGovern assumed the chair.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, later, General Torrijos, after the Carter-Torrijos statement was released, went back to Panama and in a television address, just 3 days before the vote, said this:

* * * [I]f we are attacked by superior forces, the United States is obligated to come to our defense. * * * [I]t is necessary for the United States to be committed to that when we ring the bell here, when we push the button, a bell rings over there, and the United States comes in defense of the Panama Canal. * * * I repeat, we push the button, the bell rings, and the United States is obligated to come to our defense.

There are other statements which document the point, and I urge my colleagues to review them.

Let me, for example, point to what the Library of Congress says.

Following the Carter-Torrijos statement, a memorandum provided by the American Law Division of the Library of Congress reaches this conclusion:

* * * [T]he Carter-Torrijos statement, while guaranteeing each party the right to act against threats directed at the Canal, also specifies that the United States may not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama.

It is not altogether clear that the statement would permit the United States to intervene in the event that the aggression or threat should result from Panamanian action.

The Senator from Alabama is absolutely correct. There is little likelihood that the Panama Canal is going to be attacked by a foreign power, by the Soviet Union, for example—but there is much more likelihood and much more ground for concern that an operation within Panama, perhaps even by a future Panamanian Government, could pose a threat to the canal.

I have summarized these concerns in my minority views by saying this—and I underscore them now, and urge the advocates to respond to these two points in the debate:

On this record, it is painfully obvious that the United States and Panama have been in disagreement—and still disagree, despite the October 14 Carter-Torrijos “understanding”—on at least two major points:

“Our Administration tells the American people that the United States will have the right to defend the Canal after the year 2000 against any threat to its neutrality, including an internal threat from within Panama. But spokesmen for Panama assert that the United States will have such a right only if the Canal is threatened by a foreign power.

"Our Administration tells the American people that the U.S. can determine unilaterally when sun is right to defend the Canal can be exercised. But Panamanian spokesmen insist that U.S. forces can come in only when requested or when the action is agreed to by Panama."

Now, despite the Carter-Torrijos understanding—the basic text of which is now likely to be written, in two parts, into the treaties on the recommendation of the Foreign Relations Committee—it is very obvious that we do not have true agreement on two essential points. It does not matter how many times the Committee on Foreign Relations repeats its own interpretation, or—with all due respect to him, because I do respect him—how many times the Senator from Idaho says what he thinks it means. Unilateral U.S. interpretations do not mean we have an agreement if the Panamanians do not agree with us that that is what it means.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) for his very pertinent comments, and I am delighted that he has pointed out the action that took place in the Committee on Foreign Relations with regard to these two so-called leadership amendments, that the Senators had already, in the committee, added these amendments as either one additional article or two additional articles, as the case might be, when they got word from Panama, through the State Department, that "We don't want to handle it that way."

I am not too pleased, Mr. President, with the fact that Dictator Torrijos seems to be having more influence here in the U.S. Senate and in the Committee on Foreign Relations in drafting Committee on Foreign Relations in these amendments than the Senators themselves. It looks, Mr. President—

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. No; let me proceed a little further. I have been yielding to Senators all over the floor. I will yield in a moment, but I want to complete this thought: It seems to me that we have a situation here almost like the situation that existed back, I believe, in 1940, when President Franklin Roosevelt was seeking a third term, and at the convention, the Democratic Convention, as various matters came up that President Roosevelt did not want to be concerned with, that he did not want to pass judgment on, he would say, "Clear it with Sidney," Sidney being Sidney Hillman, who was one of the great labor leaders of that day. He wanted everything cleared with Sidney. It looks like the U.S. Senate wants everything cleared with Omar, Omar being Mr. Torrijos.

If that is the attitude of the Senate, if we are going to allow Mr. Torrijos to tell us how to amend these treaties and by what method to amend them, I think then we are abdicating our role of giving advice and consent to the President in the process that we have of ratifying these treaties, if Mr. Torrijos tells the great and august Committee on Foreign Relations, "We do not like the way you are handling this amendment; we do not want you making separate articles out of these leadership amendments, because that might be something different that we might have to submit to another plebescite," and we react to it, then we are abdicating our responsibility to give advice and consent.

Are we going to let Mr. Torrijos determine whether or how we are going to amend these treaties? "I do not want to have you attach an article; just amend something."

In this connection, I have something I want to refer to a little later on. The Spanish word for amendment—"enmienda," I believe it is—is supposed to refer to a minor change, a connection, but the Spanish word "reforma" means a basic change. So he does not want the treaty reform; he wants an amendment added, which is considered, under the Spanish language, as being something minor which would justify not submitting it to another plebescite.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. CHURCH. I would like to set the Senator's mind at ease on this particular issue. I do not want him to lose any sleep over it.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I do not plan to.

Mr. CHURCH. These amendments were the result of an initiative by the Senate that commenced in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

When it became apparent, early in our hearings, that these two crucial provisions, section IV and section VI, were being interpreted differently in Panama and the United States, I was the one who first said that the Senate cannot be expected to ratify treaties if there is any serious question concerning such crucial provisions and their interpretation.

So, point No. 1 is that the initiative for these amendments did not start with Omar Torrijos; the initiative started in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It led to the President's invitation to General Torrijos to return to Washington, at which time the two Chiefs of State entered into a statement of interpretation which has now been proposed in the form of two amendments to be written into the text of the treaty itself.

Mr. ALLEN. You originally added two separate articles, though, did you not?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes. The first proposal—

Mr. ALLEN. And reconsidered that?

Mr. CHURCH. The first proposal that I made divided the text of the understanding between President Carter and General Torrijos into two parts, adding one part to section IV and the other part to section VI. I thought that the most logical way to amend was to attach each section of the understanding to the subject matter it related to in the treaties.

It was the State Department, not General Torrijos, that urged us to take a different course, which the committee then agreed to do, by adding article IX.

What the committee finally did, when the State Department reconsidered the matter, was to return to the original amendments I proposed and adopt them in the same form as I first proposed them. I certainly would not want the record left to suggest that the amendments the committee has recommended to the Senate in any way emanate from General Torrijos. They do not. They are the direct result of the initiative of the Senate itself, and they take the form I originally proposed to the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that, but did not the State Department say, after we had acted one way, "You should not have acted that way, because that is not going to please General Torrijos"; is that not correct?

Mr. CHURCH. The State Department——

Mr. ALLEN. Is that not correct?

Mr. CHURCH. The State Department was mistaken in its first recommendation to the committee, and came back after the week-end, after consultation with our Ambassador, and suggested the way I had originally proposed the amendment was the preferable way.

Mr. ALLEN. But did they not ask you to "lick the calf over," so to speak, from the action you had already taken, and do it in a different fashion? Is that not correct?

In other words, with the action you in the committee had taken, you reversed yourselves and did it in a different fashion. Is that correct?

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator is correct. The committee reversed the action they initially recommended, and reinstated the amendments originally proposed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. The amendments you proposed were never adopted by the committee and the two articles were adopted. Is that correct?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. The final action of the committee was to adopt the amendments in the form I originally proposed.

Mr. ALLEN. That is another way of answering that they redid it.

Mr. CHURCH. That is correct.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I want to comment further on Senator Church's comment about the initiatives taken by the Senate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Can I underscore what I think is an important point?

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I made the point and the Senator from Idaho ignored it. While we are not repeating dark secrets, I will say this has been in the papers, the question comes down to whether or not this language was rearranged in two different places of the treaty in order to avoid a plebiscite of the Panamanian people. Is that not a factor? Was that a major factor for the reason of this quick stepping done by the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. ALLEN. I would not be able to answer that question.

But let me proceed. I have the floor, I will say to my distinguished colleagues.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho was saying that the initiative on the amendments was started in the Foreign Relations Committee, and that thereafter Torrijos and President Carter entered into a memorandum. The memorandum was embodied in the two amendments. Overlooked was the fact that Mr. Torrijos commented on the memorandum, which is now in the leadership's two amendments, and adopted a different interpretation of the memorandum than what we adopted here in the United States, even than the interpretation that the Foreign Relations Committee adopted. So still, even though these amendments are adopted, we do not clarify the misunderstanding. There is still a misunderstanding. That is the point I am making. It is now necessary to amend the leadership amendments in order to put in new words which have unmistakable meaning. The words the distinguished Senator is relying upon in the leadership amendments do not have an undisputed meaning. They mean one thing to Torrijos, and he has so stated. The distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin) read from the record, and I mentioned it from memory, that Torrijos puts one interpretation on the meaning and the Foreign Relations Committee and the U.S. Government apparently put another interpretation on the meaning.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield for a question. I want to call attention to the fact that my remarks might extend somewhat longer than I had planned because about half of my time is being used by questioners to whom I have been yielding. I will feel free to go beyond the time I had originally estimated I might consume. I do not have prepared remarks, and I might have to go somewhat longer. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SARBANES. I appreciate the distinguished Senator yielding.

I believe the Senator from Idaho has made a most important contribution in bringing forth the two amendments now being proposed as the leadership amendments which clarify our rights under the treaty. It was at his initiative that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee moved to strengthen these treaties. I think it is generally perceived by all observers that the amendments do in fact strengthen the treaties and, therefore, constitute important additions to the documents.

As these amendments are now being proposed, they are in the form in which the distinguished Senator from Idaho proposed them in the committee. I would think that lawyers would agree that it is better to take a statement which relates to two articles in a treaty and incorporate the provisions of the statement with respect to each of the pertinent articles at the appropriate points. That is what is being done with these amendments.

I hope the distinguished Senator from Alabama does not question the initiative or the role which the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) has played in the course of the consideration of these treaties by initiating the effort to come forward with these strengthening amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not questioned his statements. As the ranking Democrat on the committee he has played an important part.

The point I am making is that after the certain language, I do not know whether the memorandum of Torrijos and President Carter was word-for-word what the distinguished Senator from Idaho was proposing or not. But whatever it was, whoever was entitled to the credit for this initiative, came up with a wrong wording, an indefinite wording, a wording susceptible, apparently, to more than one construction. Mr. Torrijos interprets it one way and the Foreign Relations Committee and our Government interpret it another way.

So far as I know, there has been no departure from the memorandum agreed to but not signed by the President and the Dictator. There has been no change in that from the original Church initiative. Whoever is responsible for the wording has wording then that is susceptible, apparently, to two constructions. Mr. Torrijos has one and the Foreign Relations Committee has another.

The point I was further making is that aside from whose initiative it was, even though the two-amendment route was proposed by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church), apparently the Committee on Foreign Relations did not agree with him, his own committee did not agree with him, and the committee came up with a different method.

Then this different route, having come to the attention of the State Department, the State Department said, "No, no, do not do that. The Panamanians will not like it. Go ahead and reverse yourselves. Kill the action you have taken, and do it the way Senator Church wants."

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. I do not think that is really fair to the initiative of the Senator from Idaho and the action of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The recommendations from the Foreign Relations Committee for amendments, which were included in its report, and the amendments which have now been proposed by the joint leadership and cosponsored by an overwhelming majority of the Members of the Senate, embodies the approach first put forward by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church). That was the approach he took in the Foreign Relations Committee and that was the approach which was finally settled upon. I think it is the most sensible way to go about amending these treaties.

The provisions contained in those amendments, as the Senator from Idaho has underscored, are designed to clarify, beyond any doubt, the rights of the United States to take certain actions to protect the neutrality of the canal and also to place our warships at the head of the line in order to gain immediate passage of the canal in case of need.

Mr. ALLEN. Then may I ask the distinguished Senator, why is it that Dictator Torrijos gives it one construction and the Committee on Foreign Relations gives it another?

Mr. SARBANES. Let me reply to that question. First of all, I know the Senator from Michigan has made that argument, but I do not agree that the provisions are being given different interpretations.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator has apparently not read the Torrijos statements.

Mr. SARBANES. I have indeed, and those statements are extensive and extended, as the distinguished Senator from Alabama knows from his own reading of them. Therefore, it is very important that one read through those statements completely, and his interpretation encompass all of the statements which have been made. On that basis, I do not agree that there is a difference in interpretation.

Second, the Panamanians have agreed to these treaties by their own volition. An agreement which gives us by the terms of the treaties many important rights and authorities. That is enormously important in terms of the American action that we can take.

I heard mentioned earlier, what could we do in the future? I only point out that we are the world's strongest military power, a nation of 218 million at present. Panama is a republic of 1.7 million people. The United States is in a position to use its power to protect its interests. But we should desire a legal and moral basis on which to use that power. That is what these treaties give to us. They give us the legal and moral basis for taking action.

The Senator from Michigan has argued for further plebiscites. The fact of the matter is that these treaties, with it understood that the joint statement is part of them, have been approved 2 to 1, in Panama.

The rationale of the opposition in Panama in the plebiscite was that the treaties are too accommodating to American interests, that they give us too much in terms of our rights to take action to protect our interests. Simply looking at American interests, I think that these treaties, with the leadership amendments to be incorporated therein, are enormously important in giving the United States the legal and moral basis to use its power to protect its interests. We ought not to lose the opportunity to gain that legal and moral basis; a basis which has been agreed to by the other party.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for his nongermane comment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator give me 30 seconds to respond?

Mr. ALLEN. Provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I want to say briefly in response to the Senator from Maryland that I am not arguing for additional plebiscites. I am arguing, however, for a new treaty relationship with the people of Panama, rather than a treaty with a temporary, self-appointed dictator. It is just as simple as that. If we end up here with a treaty that has the approval of Mr. Torrijos but does not have the approval of the people of Panama, then we are only fooling ourselves.

Who knows how quickly Mr. Torrijos' successor will seize upon the fact that these treaties have no validity—a very, very important point—because they have not been approved by the people of Panama?

If we do not change the treaties, that is a different thing. Then we in the Senate can vote them up or down, because the people of Panama have voted on them. But if we are going to change the treaties in a substantive way, then we are going to end up with a different treaty. Mr. Torrijos himself said if we put these two amendments together and called it an article, that would be a substantive change—but then he says, if you spread them out a little bit and hide them in other sections, you would not need to go back to the people of Panama for approval, even though the words are exactly the same. That, to me is a very dangerous kind of situation.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

The point is being made that we are only now going back to the original thrust of the Church initiative, which was not accepted originally by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that, after the Committee on Foreign Relations had made a separate article or articles of these amendments, the committee was advised by the State Department that that would not play in Panama, as might be said. Therefore, the Committee on Foreign Relations reversed their action, showing the influence of the Panamanian connection and showing that Mr. Torrijos has great power in shaping these treaties here in the U.S. Senate. Therefore, the committee did reverse itself and did go back to the Church initiative.

But the Church initiative, I say, Mr. President, is based upon the flawed memorandum, or the initiative started first and the flawed memorandum resulted from that. But whatever they came up with, the statement—I hesitate to call it an understanding—embodied in the memorandum between President Carter and Torrijos is flawed in that Torrijos puts one interpretation on it and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the U.S. Government apparently place another interpretation on it. That same flaw is carried forward into the leadership amendments, which are based on the memorandum which is apparently based on the Church original initiative.

Now, Mr. President, I have yielded to numerous Senators during the course of my remarks. As I stated, I have no prepared address, but I do have a number of items that I would like to cover.

In order that the continuity of my remarks be not interrupted, I am going to ask my distinguished colleagues, if they will, to allow me to speak until, say 1 o'clock, at which time I shall be glad to yield to questions by my distinguished colleagues.

I say that those Senators who have remarks to make that are not questions—and, as Senators know, a speaking Senator can yield only for questions without risking losing his right to the floor—if they have comments to make, let them store those comments up and make them when they have the floor, here in the U.S. Senate. At the present time, the junior Senator from Alabama has the floor, and he is going to talk now until 1 o'clock, at which time he will be glad to entertain questions and give such answers as he is capable of giving.

Mr. President, earlier in my remarks, I pointed out the great contributions made by Alabamians to dreaming the concept of the Panama Canal and to putting it into execution. I mentioned Senator John Tyler Morgan of Alabama, who has been called the father of the isthmian canal by no less an authority than Senator Spooner, who was author of the bill providing for a Panama canal.

Gen. William Crawford Gorgas, the conqueror of yellow fever in Panama, was an Alabamian, as was Gen. William Luther Sibert, who was the top assistant to General Goethals. I should like to read a tribute to Senator Morgan—who, I might say, is one of my all-time favorite U.S. Senators, whether they come from Alabama or any other State in the Union. In the authoritative book, "Cadiz to Cathay," by Miles Duvall, starting on page 424, there is a summing up of the great contribution made by Senator Morgan. I am not, at this time, going to go into the contributions of General Gorgas and General Sibert, but I do feel that Senator John T. Morgan of Alabama played such an important role in visualizing the need and importance of an isthmian canal that I shall be remiss in my duty as a U.S. Senator from the State of Alabama if I do not call my colleagues' attention to his great contribution.

I quote, starting on page 424:

It was Senator John T. Morgan of Alabama who did most in those apathetic years of 1880-1903 to keep the issue alive and to campaign against reputed British encroachments. At first bitterly disappointed at the adoption of Panama in preference to Nicaragua, when real work started on the Panama Canal he took a great interest in it, for the end he was for any canal rather than no canal. He never lost faith in the ultimate accomplishment of his dreams. Some day, perhaps not until the Nicaragua Canal is built, some biographer will write the story of Morgan's life and work and thus give his name the great place it deserves in this important phase of American history.

Although a partisan of Nicaragua and represented as being of a most stubborn nature in his Senate conflicts, Morgan had a greater vision. Underlying his partisan behavior there was the larger view, well expressed by him in a letter to Joaquin Bernardo Calvo, one-time Costa Rican Minister in Washington:

Senator Morgan wrote this. This was written prior to 1907 because that was the date of Senator Morgan's death.

I need not speak of the motives that have so long impelled me to labor for an isthmian canal, against opposition that came from various powerful sources, at home and abroad, and often seemed beyond the power of resistance. You know that our Southern States are still buried under the ashes of the great civil war, and that an isthmian canal is the best, if not the only hope of lifting them above the debris, through the energies of production and through commercial intercourse with the Pacific Ocean.

The selection of the route is a secondary consideration provided the conditions are equally favorable to all concerned.

This passage is particularly interesting:

Later studies have shown that Morgan was essentially right in his views. The Nicaraguan Canal, as he saw in his day, was the preferable route from the standpoint of the welfare of the United States, especially the South:

I hasten to say this was Senator Morgan's view and not necessarily the view of history.

It has been predicted that if this canal were available today two-thirds of the transisthmian traffic would use the Nicaragua route because of its shorter distances for certain trade lanes. That fact, however, makes it fortunate that Panama was built first, as that still leaves a strong reason to build Nicaragua, whereas if Nicaragua had been built first no such impelling incentive could have been created for Panama and the present canal undoubtedly would have been delayed, as Panama leaders realized, even for centuries.

So if the Nicaraguan route had been successful, if it had been the one chosen, then we would not be here today debating this issue of whether or not we would give the canal to Panama.

Then again, Mr. President, on page 166 of that same authoritative work we read of the debate regarding the Panama Canal issue in the Senate:

At times the debate was bitter but not so bitter as to obscure the great part Morgan had played in the history of transisthmian water communication. To him was given one of the greatest tributes in the records of Congress, when on June 18 Senator Spooner declared:

I say again, Senator Spooner was the author of the bill providing for the Panama Canal. This is the great tribute he paid to Senator Morgan:

Upon whatever route an isthmian canal shall be constructed, the Senator from Alabama will forever stand in the memory of the people as the father of the isthmian canal; for, in season and out of season, in sunshine and in storm, unappalled by obstacles and adverse influences, with lofty patriotism and unflinching purpose, he has, with rare skill tireless industry, and splendid advocacy, fought for an isthmian canal. When it comes, and it will come, his name will deservedly be identified with it far above that of any other man.

Mr. President, I felt that it was appropriate that I pay this tribute to Alabama's great U.S. Senator of the past, John Tyler Morgan, for his great contribution toward the building of the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, why should we have a Panama Canal Treaty? Is it because of a good neighbor policy?

I believe that is carrying good neighborliness just a little bit too far.

Is it because the canal is indefensible? I think not, because under the treaty and the side agreements we are withdrawing from 10 of the 14 bases that we have defending the canal and if those in charge of such military matters feel that 4 bases are sufficient and that 14 are not needed, it is quite obvious, it would seem to me, that the canal can be defended.

Is it because of sabotage? Is it because of fear of sabotage?

The treaties wipe out the Panama Canal Zone and, whereas now the United States controls 5 miles on each side of the canal, as soon as the treaties are approved the boundaries of the canal zone will cease to exist and all of the territory will be Panamanian.

So if we are fearing sabotage, we are bringing the Panamanians 5 miles closer on each side of the canal.

Sabotage is no reason, or the fear of sabotage is no reason, to give the Panama Canal away.

Now, can we combat potential sabotage? I think so.

I quote from the February 9, 1978, Congressional Record a statement made by our distinguished majority leader—Mr. Robert C. Byrd. He made it not just once, but twice, and I make this statement, even though he is absent from the floor, because it is a correct statement, it is an honorable statement, it is a fair statement, and it is a correct assessment of the situation.

Senator BYRD said:

There is not any conceivable situation that could arise in Panama if these treaties were rejected, no conceivable situation that could possibly arise in Panama that we could not handle with our military.

So, Mr. President, there is no need to worry about the possible sabotage on the part of the Panamanians.

Why would they kill the goose that lays the golden egg? Seventy-five percent of the employees of the Panama Canal Company are Panamanians, and much of the high standard of living that the Panamanians have is traceable directly to the Panama Canal operations.

I fear, Mr. President, that these treaties are indicative and symptomatic of the growing trend in this country to be willing to give away our very substance. Already, we have contributed overseas more than $200 billion since 1946. Already, around the world, when resistance is given to us, we are willing to withdraw, to retreat. Here we set another example of our unwillingness to stand up for our rights, to stand up for our interests.

We seem principally concerned with coming up with a treaty that meets with the approval of dictator Torrijos, which will not require him to submit the treaties to a plebiscite.

On the matter of a plebiscite, what is wrong with a plebiscite? Mr. Torrijos jumped the gun on the other plebiscite. He could have called it any time he wanted to. He knew these treaties were going to come up before the U.S. Senate. He knew the U.S. Senate had the power to amend these treaties. Why, then, did he jump the gun and call for a plebiscite in Panama on the treaties?

He called a plebiscite. By a vote of 2 to 1, the people endorsed the treaties. If they would endorse them then, why would they not endorse them now, even if changes are made? But Mr. Torrijos, for some reason, must feel that his control over the Panamanians has slipped, that he could not succeed in another plebiscite.

So what he is saying to the U.S. Senate, in effect—I suppose he is actually saying it, for that matter—is, “Do not amend these treaties in substantive form. Do not have any substantive amendments, because that is going to make me resubmit these treaties to a plebiscite in Panama.”

What should be the proper concern of the U.S. Senate? Obviously, it should be what is in the best interests of the United States and the people of the United States. Should we be concerned with whether or not Torrijos can get these treaties approved again in another plebiscite?

That should certainly not be our primary concern. Our primary concern should be, and must be, how can these treaties be shaped to best protect the interests and the security of the canal, and thereby the security and best interests of the American people?

Are we going to adopt the leadership amendment, which apparently has different interpretations in the United States than in Panama, and having done that, stonewall the remainder of the amendments?

I call attention to this vaunted leadership amendment. It is not greatly different from article 4 of the Panama Canal Treaty. But again I say that it is susceptible, apparently of two constructions and overlooks the fact that by the year 2000 all our troops will have been withdrawn from the Canal Zone, unless we can amend the leadership amendment, and any action on our part to defend the canal would be done by our acting in the role of an invader of that country. We can imagine the international repercussions that would be caused by the United States forcing itself back into Panama after all our troops are gone, and I would not wonder at that.

So what we need to do is to protect our right to defend the canal, if we are going to give it away. But as I say, we are getting the cart before the horse. We should be considering the Panama Canal Treaty first in order to decide whether we are going to give it away, before we decide whether we are going to plan for its defense down the road.

The amendment I intend to offer provides that our military presence could continue after December 31, 1999, if the President deems it is necessary for the defense of the canal or the maintenance of its neutrality and he so certifies to the Panamanian Government prior to December 31, 1999.

Mr. President, the giving of the canal to Panama changes the entire nature of the operation of the canal. The United States has operated the canal on a nonprofit basis, and it has been a benefit to the world, as they are able to use this canal, and the United States does not make a profit from it. Now it is going to change.

I am not going to comment on the full amount it is going to cost the taxpayers. That is going to be commented upon by others. However, after assurances were made time and time again by the proponents of the treaties that it would be at no cost to the taxpayer-ers of the United States, the administration finally came out with a statement a few days ago saying, "Well, we were wrong about that. It is going to cost the taxpayers $600 million." That is just a start, as will be pointed out. But I feel that my time today is limited, even though under the rules it is not limited.

We are changing this entire operation of the canal.

Mr. Barletta, the Minister of Economic Planning in Panama, estimated that in the 22-year existence of the Panama Canal Treaty, Panama would receive—and this is largely from tolls, I will concede—$2.262 billion, this not counting the tremendous properties being turned over at this time, this not counting the loan program that has been made up for them of $345 million, this not counting the $319 million that is still owed to the U.S. Treasury on the canal.

They are going to receive, according to Minister Barletta, $100 million a year from the tolls. The treaties provide, at article XIII in the Panama Canal Treaty, that after the Panama Canal Commission runs a deficit, and it surely will, we will have to clear that before the year 2000, when we are obligated to turn the canal over to Panama free of debt.

Mr. President, let us consider for a moment this Panama Canal Commission that is set up to take the place of the Panama Canal Co. which now operates the canal for the U.S. Government. They are going to set up a commission to take over the canal. That is not talking about the year 2000. That is talking about the fact that as soon as these treaties are approved, they would turn the canal over to the Panama Canal Commission.

What is the makeup of this commission?

It has nine members. Five of them are American nationals, it says, and four of them are Panamanians. How do you choose the Panamanians? They are chosen by a list being furnished to the U.S. Government. That is all it says. It does not say who is going to appoint them. I assume it will be the President. He appoints the members of the Panama Canal Co., as I understand it. And a significant feature, Mr. President, is that whereas the members of the Panama Canal Co. have to be approved by the U.S. Senate the members of the Panama Canal Commission, nine in number, five Americans and four Panamanians, do not have to be approved by the U.S. Senate. So, Mr. Torrijos could send over the names of any four Panamanians he might wish to send over, no matter what their reputation, no matter what their background, no matter what their ties to other foreign governments, and it is incumbent on the United States to appoint those four without any confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

All right. Starting out with four Panamanians and five Americans, not approved by the Senate, suppose one of the five Americans sides completely with the Panamanian position. That would give Panama actual control right from the start.

The treaty provides, further, that whereas they have an American administrator until the year 1990, at that time they appoint a Panamanian administrator of the canal, so actually it would seem instead of waiting until the end of this century for Panama to get full control it looks like, with the administrator coming in, the Panamanian in 1990, Panama pretty well has control rights from the start.

Mr. President, I want to talk about the head-of-the-line provision that we hear so much talk about to the effect that they have accomplished great wonders for the security of the United States under this head-of-the-line provision. Let us see about that, just what it does say about the head of the line for American warships. We have not heard Mr. Torrijos' construction of this phase of the leadership amendment. But we have heard his construction of the memorandum:

In accordance with the Statement of Understanding mentioned in Article IV above: 'The Neutrality Treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the Canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Canal rapidly.'

In the first place, this gives Panama an equal right with the United States to be entitled to emergency treatment. In other words, the Panamanians will be in charge completely starting with the year 2000. It does not say which will have priority, the United States or Panama. So obviously the Panamanian ships, under a Panamanian ownership and administration of the canal, it would seem to me, would get priority treatment over the United States. Let us read on:

without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line * * *

Who is going to determine the need or the emergency? Panama will be sitting there controlling the operation. They own the canal. They operate the canal. They maintain the canal. They defend the canal. Who is going to say whether it is an emergency?

Panama could well take the position: Well, I see no emergency. You ought to just wait your own good time. By the way, we have these two or three Panamanian vessels that certainly need to go first and we have equal right with the United States under this so-called leadership amendment.

So I do not believe that this properly defines who determines whether there is an emergency or not. And I feel that the amendment is defective at that point.

Once again I point out I am a cosponsor of this amendment but that fact does not keep me from seeing its shortcomings and its very serious defects.

Once again, Mr. President, we are going to hear from time to time as amendments are offered here on the floor that this amendment or that amendment is not needed. I dare say amendments accepted by the leadership of really substantive nature are going to be few and far between, and for adoption of any amendment to strengthen the interests of the United States under these treaties the process is going to be like pulling eye teeth before the proponents of these leadership amendments will agree to any others. And they, the joint leadership, the Democratic leadership and the Republican leadership, are going to assure Members here that the leadership amendments take care of everything and we do not need any other amendments. Mr. Torrijos does not want any more amendments. Once again, I say we ought not to be concerned with what Mr. Torrijos will accept or what he wants.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I guess we are near enough to 1 o'clock. I stated I was going to speak until 1 o'clock without allowing interruption. Since this is the first request for my yielding, I will yield for a question.

[Mr. Johnston assumed the chair.]

Mr. SCHMITT. A little bit earlier in a colloquy that the Senator from Alabama had with the Senator from Idaho, this Senator, the Senator from New Mexico had an impression that he heard something that he would just like to have clarified. Was it the Senator's understanding that prior to the introduction of the resolution for ratification there would be communication between parties unnamed, presumably the Senate and the Government of Panama, to see if whatever amendments had appeared by that time would in fact be acceptable?

Mr. ALLEN. As I understand the procedures—

Mr. SCHMITT. I realize that is not Senate procedure, but I thought that is what the Senator from Idaho said.

Mr. ALLEN. As I understand the procedure, once the Senate agrees to the terms of the treaty, then a resolution of ratification is presented which embodies the provisions of the treaties as finally agreed to by the Senate. That resolution of ratification transmits it to the President and then, depending on whether Panama has taken all the steps it needs to take with respect to the approval of the treaty—up until that time you do not have a treaty. The missing ingredient would be whether Torrijos needs to submit the treaties as finally agreed to here in the Senate for the same type of approval that he got originally when he jumped the gun on calling a plebiscite.

Mr. SCHMITT. Well, I had the distinct impression—maybe the Senator from Idaho would be willing to clarify this—that he said that prior to the resolution of ratification being approved in the U.S. Senate, there would be some indication from the Torrijos government as to whether or not the amended treaties were acceptable.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, if so, that would not be official. With the "advice and consent" he is now giving our actions here, he seems to have taken over that role, but it would not be an official action to advise us—he would ratify.

Mr. SCHMITT. I fully recognize that, and maybe the Senator from Idaho will clarify that point.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator yield to me for that purpose?

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield. I do not yield my right to the floor. I yield the Senator 5 minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. CHURCH. The able Senator from Alabama has stated the legal procedures accurately, and I have attempted to explain them earlier. Once the Senate has worked its will on these treaties, however the Senate may choose to amend them, the consent that the Senate gives is based upon the action that the Senate takes.

The treaties thus amended would be accompanied by an instrument of ratification, properly executed by the President or the Secretary of State, or someone acting in his behalf. By like token, the Panamanian Government must execute an instrument of ratification relating to these amended treaties.

The two instruments of ratification are then deposited in Panama and in the United States, and upon the deposit of the instruments of ratification the treaties, as amended, become of binding force and effect.

Mr. SCHMITT. The Senator from New Mexico understands that sequence. What is of concern to the Senator from New Mexico was the statement that he believed he heard the Senator from Idaho make, that prior to the vote on the instrument of ratification, on the resolution of ratification, there would be some type of interaction with the Government of Panama in order to determine whether the amended treaties would be acceptable.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator from New Mexico misunderstood my remarks.

Mr. SCHMITT. Good. I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. CHURCH. Whatever the Government of Panama feels it must do under its constitution is up to the Government of Panama. I do not care. Whether they need another plebiscite is for them to determine, not for us to determine. Our responsibility is to amend these treaties as we think best conforms to the interests of the United States. That is our responsibility. Having done that, if the Torrijos government believes it must submit the amended treaties to the people of Panama for another plebiscite, that is up to them to decide, under their laws and their constitution.

Mr. SCHMITT. I appreciate the clarification. I think a number of other Senators misunderstood the earlier statement, and I think the clarification is good for this body and for the public.

I thank the Senator for that, and I again thank the Senator from Alabama for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, amendments will be offered here on the floor to the Neutrality Treaty and to the Panama Canal Treaty. "Selected Documents," from the Bureau of Public Affairs Office of Media Services contains the treaties and the amended annex and protocols in 22 pages. Accompanying that document—that is accompanying both treaties, their annexes, amendments, and protocols, calling on the other nations of the world to agree to this Panama Canal Neutrality Treaty—connected with these documents and referred to often in the treaties, but, according to a ruling of the Vice President—not a ruling because the question was not up, but in the response of the distinguished Vice President, Mr. Mondale, to a parliamentary inquiry which I made the first day the treaties were before the Senate—these tremendous "Selected Documents" occupying 64 pages of the same size paper as the treaties, these tremendous documents going into nearly every phase of the agreements, overlapping, in some cases, the provisions of the treaties, are incredibly not before the Senate, according to the response of the distinguished Vice President.

That being true, Mr. President, since the Senate is not going to get any opportunity to act on these tremendous documents having to do with implementing the treaties, it is going to be necessary—and the distinguished Vice President did concede that this might be done—to offer amendments to one or both of the treaties if we are going to change any of the provisions of the “selected documents.”

That being true, since we cannot amend the documents, we are going to be put to the need or to the requirement of amending the treaties; and that being true, there are going to be quite a few amendments.

The first amendment I intend to call up, as I have stated—but I feel that while I am talking about amendments I should mention this—is an amendment that calls attention to the fact that the so-called leadership amendment ignores the fact that all of our troops are to be out of Panama by the year 2000.

This so-called leadership amendment, which I must stress again is construed differently in Panama from the way it is construed here in the United States—would provide for our defense of the canal; but after the year 2000 all of our troops would be gone. So any defense—they make a big to-do about unilateral rights. Well, we can have unilateral rights without a scrap of paper, because if we want to go in and defend the canal, we could do it. What difference does it make whether we say in the document that we have got the right to defend the canal, when we have already got that right?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. No, not until I get through, let me say to the Senator.

What the proponents overlook is the fact that all of our troops will be gone from Panama, and if we come in at all to defend the canal, we will, in effect, have to invade Panama. We will either have to come in with an amphibious landing or in an air assault with paratroopers.

But under my amendment, Mr. President, this pledge is fulfilled; this oversight, shall we say, of the leadership amendment is taken care of.

My amendment, which I intend to offer at the proper time, says that the military presence of the United States shall continue beyond December 3, 1999, if the President of the United States deems it is necessary for the defense of the canal, or for preserving its neutrality, and so certifies to the Panamanian Government prior to December 31, 1999.

We do not know what the conditions in Panama will be in the year 2000, or what form of government they will have. We know Russia and Cuba may want all of Panama or all of the canal. We do not know whether it will be a satellite of either of those countries.

This amendment does give the President of the United States the option to continue our military presence there beyond the year 1999, if he deems it is necessary, for the defense and maintaining its neutrality.

Now I will be glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland if he wishes me to.

Mr. SARBANES. Not at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, as much as we cannot change these documents by amendment, I believe it is necessary to put into the treaties amendments which will refer to the same areas as these documents and make them a part of the treaty.

Mr. President, the Presiding Officer in his responses to my inquiries seemed to indicate that if the negotiators of the treaty would come up with a treaty saying that the parties hereto agree to certain terms, which are set out in more detail in a signed agreement, if the Senate was unwise enough to agree to something like that then the whole thing could be handled by a signed executive agreement.

We have twice as much, we have three times as much, in the signed side agreements as we have in the treaties themselves.

It would seem to me it would be a bad precedent to agree to something not even in the treaties. These very important matters are referred to only in another document that the Senate cannot change.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SARBANES. I thought at the beginning of the debate when the Senator had his exchange with the Chair and made a number of inquiries, it was clear that provisions in documents that were outside of the treaties themselves were actually not before the Senate for amendment. If the Senator feels such provisions should be in the treaties themselves, he obviously has the opportunity to offer amendments to the treaty which would incorporate or bring into the treaty any provisions the Senator deemed important. I understood that the Senator has that opportunity through the amendment process.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator did not quite understand what the Senator from Alabama was saying. The Senator from Alabama said that the Chair, in response to my inquiry, made a statement that whereas the selected documents are before the Senate, in a sense they are not before the Senate to allow the Senate to amend them. They are just here. They are in limbo. These side provisions cannot be touched by amendments, per se, to these related documents.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield further——

Mr. ALLEN. I believe if the Senator will get a staff man to check the statements, he will find what the Senator from Alabama says in his response is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I do not think there is any difference. If there are provisions in documents outside of the treaty which the Senator from Alabama thinks should be part and parcel to the treaty, the Senator from Alabama can offer amendments to that effect.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is just repeating what I have said. This side agreement tactic is to put us to offering amendments to treaties which would be contrary or at variance with, or sometimes in compliance with, the signed agreements. The point the Senator from Alabama is making is that the agreements themselves are not subject to amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. The treaty is the governing document. If the Senator wishes to offer amendments to the treaty and they are adopted——

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Alabama understands all of that.

Mr. SARBANES. Then we have no difference.

Mr. ALLEN. All the Senator from Alabama is saying is that it is going to require numerous amendments in order to counteract the provisions in these signed documents. That is all the Senator from Alabama is saying. I hope that is clear to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

The Senator from Alabama has explained why numerous amendments must be offered, because the length of the signed document is three times as long as the treaties themselves, and we cannot touch the signed documents except by amendment of the treaties themselves.

Now, Mr. President, on another matter, as I said in my remarks earlier today, I commended the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader on their decision that due to the importance of this issue a reasonably long period would be set aside for consideration of the treaties. The distinguished majority leader is quoted as saying that he estimates the treaties would require anywhere from 3 to 5 weeks of debate, that the Senate will be allowed to have a full and extensive debate, and would have the opportunity to offer numerous constructive amendments. I feel that no dilatory amendments will be offered and no dilatory tactics will be used.

I think it is important to emphasize that we will have the opportunity to offer amendments and to speak with respect to the amendments and the treaties themselves.

There was an article in the New York Times in the last week by the able and distinguished columnist Mr. Tom Wicker commenting on the remarks I made here on the floor. I will read from that document. He has something to say about a filibuster and I would like to comment on it:

Senator James Allen of Alabama * * * a dedicated treaty opponent, was even heard to say that we would not engage in "debate by cliches," a position that shatters all Senate precedents. He also offered a Washington Post interviewer the dubious theory that a filibuster or stalling tactics would "serve no purpose" in the treaty debate—although on the face of it, a ratification question requiring a two-thirds vote seems a splendid opportunity for an opposition filibuster.

That is a non/sequitur.

We shall see what we shall see.

The distinguished columnist, Mr. Wicker, says:

Although on the face of it a ratification requiring a two-thirds vote seems a splendid opportunity for an opposition filibuster.

Just the contrary, Mr. President, because it takes 67 votes to approve the treaties, to give the Senate's advice and consent to the ratification of the treaties, only 60 votes to cut off a filibuster. So it hardly seems logical to say that, since it takes 67 votes to approve the treaties, therefore, that is a good place for a filibuster. Just the contrary is true. That is one reason we shall not have a filibuster, because of the numbers involved, because 60 votes can cut off a filibuster, 67 votes are required to approve the treaties.

Another reason there will not be a filibuster, Mr. President, is that if the treaties, in effect, are defeated, or a better phrase would be prevented from coming to a vote, by extended debate, that would not be a defeat. They would remain on the calendar and any time the leadership wanted to bring the treaties up, they could do so just by moving to go into executive session, which is nondebata-

ble. So even if we had the votes to maintain a filibuster, we would not have accomplished our goal; we would not have defeated the treaties, because they remain on the calendar, would be printed every day, and could be brought up whenever the leadership thought it had a sufficient number of votes.

More than that, the reason there will be no filibuster, Mr. President, is that, in my judgment, public opinion would not support a filibuster. A filibuster, or extended debate—which term I usually prefer—if it does not have public support, does not have public opinion behind it, is going to fail. The only chance of a filibuster ever succeeding is when public opinion supports it. Public opinion, in my judgment, wants a final determination of this issue. I think public opinion is opposed to the Senate giving its advice and consent to the ratification of these treaties.

Now, I know that it is awfully hard for opponents of the treaties to be in opposition to the leadership of our respective parties. The joint leadership is a tremendous force here in the U.S. Senate. The majority leadership is plenty potent; when you combine that with the minority leadership, you have a force that is very strong, indeed. It is hard to defeat and it is hard to buck.

Then, you add to that the great power of the President and the administration pushing for the approval of these treaties. It does make the role of the opponents of the treaties very difficult, indeed. But I am hopeful that enough Senators will respond to public opinion, which, in my judgment, is strongly opposed to agreeing to these treaties, and that we will, if not able to defeat them in their entirety, add amendments—constructive amendments, substantive amendments—that will protect the best interests of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, going further into the matter of extended debate and the possibility that the leadership might seek to limit debate, I should say that that would not be in the best interests of the approval of the treaties, because, for one thing, we do not know what legislation we are going to be asked to pass in the Senate having to do with the national coal strike. If cloture is ever invoked on this treaty, that blocks everything until the treaty is disposed of, which might take weeks. So I do hope that we will not invoke cloture in this matter, because I do not believe it will hasten the time when we will have a direct vote.

I do not know how long the secret session is going to last tomorrow. If we get out at a reasonable hour, I do plan, on Tuesday, to offer my motion to reverse the order of consideration of these treaties. I shall move to go first to the Panama Canal Treaty, which provides for the transfer of the canal over to Panama and the conditions under which the transfer will be made, rather than consider the neutrality treaty, which in the main, has to do with the defense of the canal starting with the year 2000.

I was asked just the other day by a major proponent of the treaties about how long I might possibly take on these treaties. I stated that it was my assessment that if we do reverse the order of these treaties, we shall probably knock a week off the time necessary to come to vote on the treaties. I do not believe that made any impression on this major proponent of the treaties.

Now, Mr. President, we have heard a lot about human rights and the lack of human rights down in Panama. Well, obviously, if we turn over to Mr. Torrijos' government—and that is pretty nearly the same thing as saying Mr. Torrijos—$100 million a year for the next 22 years, it is going to allow him to perpetuate himself and his regime in office. Dictator Torrijos has promised to do better down there, to do great wonders and all, but, obviously, I place no confidence whatsoever in what he says. Here we are in the anomalous situation of talking about human rights and preserving human rights, demanding human rights all over the globe, and we are handing $100 million to a government that knows nothing about human rights in order to allow it to perpetuate itself in office. I hardly feel that that is the right action for the U.S. Senate to take.

Another matter, and I mention this because it did come up—it was the subject of a hearing by the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee—is the provision of the Constitution having to do with the disposition of property of the United States. Article IV, section 3, paragraph 2 of the Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and to make all needful regulations with respect to the territories or other property belonging to the United States. That power having been given to the Congress, embracing both the Senate and the House of Representatives, certainly, according to legal scholars, that vests that power in the Congress alone. Yet we see the administration saying that we do not need approval of the House of Representatives to dispose of property of the United States. This approach is unconstitutional and, if consummated, in a legal sense would be void.

While we are talking about property, we hear a whole lot about sovereignty and whether or not the United States has sovereignty or is entitled to operate as if it were sovereign. The fact of the matter is that the United States owns this property in the Canal Zone in fee simple; whether it has sovereignty or not is really not important.

We are disposing of the physical property of the canal and the public property and lands in the Canal Zone. Yet the administration is unwilling to allow the House of Representatives to pass on this issue, even though I understand that more than 218 Members of the House have introduced a resolution asking that this matter be submitted to the House of Representatives, as well.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. My recollection is that the hearings revealed that the U.S. Government paid a substantial sum, I believe in excess of $3 million, to individual property owners.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Owners of farms, buildings, lots, and the like, in Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. A much larger sum.

Mr. CURTIS. My question is this: If this treaty is adopted, in whom will that previously owned personal property, in whom will the title be vested for this previously owned property?

Mr. ALLEN. It will be my guess. I say to my distinguished colleague from Nebraska, it would belong to the Government of Panama if the treaties are agreed to. If the treaties are agreed to and the House of Representatives is allowed to act on it and approves it—but I think the contention will be made whether the House acts or not, that the property goes to the Government of Panama. That is my judgment.

Mr. CURTIS. One other question.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think they want us to own a foot of land down there, or have a single soldier down there.

Mr. CURTIS. Can the Senator tell me who took title to the land back at the time of the original treaty that was adopted when these sums were paid in order to compensate those owners of private property down there?

Mr. ALLEN. I am not absolutely sure. It would be the U.S. Government or an agency of the U.S. Government. I rather believe the Panama Canal Company was set up prior to the transfer of these properties, but I am not absolutely sure.

It is either the Government of the United States or an agency or branch of the U.S. Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that the treaty that is before us, the first principal sanction sets aside the old treaty entirely?

Mr. ALLEN. It does, indeed, and that reminds me of another point I want to make, I say to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, if we approve the treaties before us, we carry over no rights that we had in the existing treaty and are limited only to those rights that this new treaty gives us?

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly right, exactly right.

Mr. CURTIS. Does that make it more important than ever that Panama, and its chief executives, and this Government, agree on interpretation of what the language in the new treaty provides?

Mr. ALLEN. Very definitely, I say to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. If the new treaty is approved, then so far as any rights of the United States of any kind in that whole area, we start from scratch and only have those rights specifically given us in the new treaty?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct, unless possibly the implementing legislation might possibly confer some rights on us. But I would say that in all likelihood the Senator is correct.

I give an example, the implementing legislation might require that this $319 million that is still owed on the canal might have to be paid or the interest might have to be paid on that, but that would be just on the day-to-day operation of the canal and not basic rights in the canal.

Mr. CURTIS. It is often said that the approval of these treaties before us should not be decided by prejudice or personal interest, but should be decided in the national interest.

Does the distinguished Senator agree with the Senator from Nebraska in the assertion that our national interest is the future operation of the canal, assuring without question all of the rights and prerogatives that this country needs from the standpoint of defense, as well as the passage of commerce through the canal, as well as protection from having the canal used by a nation that might have declared war against the United States?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I certainly agree with the distinguished Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, what are the facts in reference to the new treaty and the use of the canal by a nation at war with the United States?

Mr. ALLEN. Under the present treaty, there is a method of preventing belligerents from using the canal. A vessel will have to have been in the Panamanian waters there for a certain time and thereafter it would be difficult for an enemy vessel to go through the canal.

But under the new treaties, we are obligated to let enemy subs or enemy warships ply the canal just like our own ships.

We might have some right to prior passage under the leadership amendment, but we do have to maintain neutrality and that means that enemy warships can use it, just like our own ships.

Mr. CURTIS. And if we sought to stop them from it, we would be running in the face of a solemn agreement if we ratify these treaties?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. The distinguished Senator from Alabama is an excellent student of history. I would like to ask him, throughout the years that the United States has operated this canal, what has its record been so far as being fair with the commerce of the world?

Mr. ALLEN. Extremely fair. The canal, under the Panama Canal Company, which is an arm of the U.S. Government, has been operated on a nonprofit basis and that is going to end with the approval of the treaties in that Panama is going to skim approximately $100 million a year out of the operation.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not correct that from the time the canal started operating until just the last couple of years or so we never raised the tolls because we agreed to operate it at cost?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. I believe it was 4 or 5 years ago, there was a raise. But, of course, under the treaty we start off with a raise of 30 cents a ton that goes to Panama, and also certain other guarantees made there that are supposed to come out of the tolls, but, whether they are sufficient to come out of the tolls or not, that is another way the taxpayer is going to come into play here. If they have deficits there at the end of the term of the Panama Canal Treaty, we are obligated to turn the canal and the Panama Canal Commission over to Panama free of debt, and that includes the $319 million they still owe on the original Panama Canal.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from Alabama know of anyone urging the ratification of these treaties and basing his argument on criticism of the way the United States has operated this canal for the benefit of the consumers of the world?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe that any such argument certainly would be refuted by the facts.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, there is no accumulation of complaints or substantial complaints of any kind against the way the United States has run the canal in the past, so far as accommodating the commerce of the world is concerned?

Mr. ALLEN. Not that I know of.

Mr. CURTIS. What interests of the United States would be advanced by the ratification of these treaties?

Mr. ALLEN. I know of none, except the dubious thought that it is in furtherance of a good neighbor policy, that by giving this tremendous natural asset to Panama, we would create good will for our country. But I think that is very dubious and contrary to recognized positions, because we have found that we have not been able to make a lot of friends through a liberal foreign aid policy.

I know of no friendships we have created, after having dumped about $200 billion overseas in foreign aid since 1946. I believe there would be less respect for the United States among the countries of the world, including Central and South America, if we were to allow ourselves to be frightened into these treaties.

Mr. CURTIS. In reference to the policy of the United States in matters of world affairs, can the Senator from Alabama think of any instance in which we have withdrawn from a particular area because of the desire not to confront opposition and it has resulted in peace and quiet and self-government and the protection of human rights for the area involved?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I cannot think of any that had that result. I think it is not likely that we will find any such instance, because I believe that human nature is such that if we give an enemy or a potential enemy a mile, he will take 2 miles.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator regard the basic policy, whether to surrender the treaty and attempt to appease militant minorities, or whatever they represent, as something which will improve the position of the United States?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I do not believe it would. I think it would weaken the position of the United States around the world.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank my distinguished friend for his answers.

I think it is incumbent upon those who advocate the ratification of these treaties, whereby we repeal or set aside the old one, to prove that the United States has not operated the canal in the past for the good of all parties concerned. Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. ALLEN. I certainly do.

Mr. CURTIS. Has the Senator from Alabama, in his very regular attendance here at the debates, heard any speech that establishes proof of the failure of the United States to manage properly the canal for the good of the commerce of the world?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I suggest that it has not been made.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for his very penetrating questions and the opportunity he has given me to reply to them.

One of the provisions of the treaty that the distinguished Senator is questioning reminded me of is provision that during the life of this treaty, 22 years, the States, that we not have the right to negotiate with any other country for the building of a canal, without Panamanian consent. They make the strange argument that that provision was put in the treaty for the benefit of the United States, that we not have the right to negotiate with another nation for the building of another canal across the isthmus.

I hardly see that that is for the benefit of the United States. But they say, "Well, by getting that agreement, we got the agreement that they would not allow another nation to build a canal there in Panama."

That sounds pretty good, until you consider that the United States, under the 1903 treaty, has a monopoly in Panama on the building of transisthmus canals through Panama anywhere in Panama.

So, as the distinguished Senator from Nebraska said, we will have to do away, under these treaties, with every agreement entered into in the past. So if we have agreed in the past that only the United States can build a canal in Panama, they first have us give up that right under the 1903 treaty and say, "Now you don't have that right, and we can give the right to some other nation. So, in return for our not giving any other nation the right to build a canal, you had better agree that you won't build anywhere other than Panama."

So they get us to give up our monopoly and then offer to trade us something we already have, in return for giving up the right to negotiate with another nation for another transisthmus canal. Obviously, doing away with the 1903 treaty deprives us of that right we now have; and in order to get it back, we have to agree that we will not negotiate with another country for the building of a canal.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for another question?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. We live at a time when all governments find their costs going up, and figures have to be updated every once in a while. Would it be possible for the United States to retain the existing treaty and still give consideration to whether or not the existing dollar payments to Panama should be increased?

Mr. ALLEN. I appreciate the Senator asking that question, because it is something I would like to see done. But there are no circumstances under which I would vote for treaties with Panama—not these treaties—having to do with the canal.

The one thing I would be willing to concede on, provided our rights under the 1903 treaty were preserved, is that we have the right to operate, maintain, and defend the canal in perpetuity, as we now have, the one thing I would be willing to see changed is this $2.3 million annuity that the United States pays to Panama, that it could get from the tolls—I believe that would be a more proper way of increasing it—I would be willing to see that increased manifold. Tenfold would not shock me in the slightest, even twentyfold, which would get it up in the neighborhood of $50 million. I would not object to that concession being made.

However, I do think that the only way we are going to protect our national interests and our economic interests is to maintain our ownership, our control, our right to maintain, and our right to defend the canal.

So it would be only in that instance that I would be willing to agree to any new treaty with Panama.

Mr. CURTIS. If the distinguished Senator will yield further for another question: Is it not true that this upgrading of the numbers could even be done without resorting to the treaty procedure?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. It has been done. It just started out that Panama at the outset received $10 million and then $250,000 a year annuity and that has been gradually hiked up to $2.3 million. So it could be done, yes.

Mr. CURTIS. So this new treaty cannot be urged upon America as a necessary vehicle in order to update the payments in the light of world crisis and many costs that all governments must incur?

Mr. ALLEN. No, it cannot be.

Mr. CURTIS. Again I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator for his question.

Mr. President, if I may conclude my remarks, I shall send to the desk at the conclusion of my remarks an amendment that I plan to offer to article I of the Neutrality Treaty, if we do not move to the other treaties, as I feel we should, that would make this amendment an addition, in effect, to the thought of the leadership amendment. It does not apply to the leadership amendment. At another time it will be offered doubtless to the leadership amendment. But this will just amend article I, since it is only article I that can be amended at this time, having to do with our right to defend the canal and our right to maintain troops in the Canal Zone subsequent to December 31, 1999.

It reads:

Provided that the military presence of the United States in what was the Panama Canal Zone on September 7, 1977 * * *

And that is at the time of the signing of the treaties by Torrijos and President Carter—the military presence of the United States shall be continued beyond December 31, 1999, if the President of the United States deems it necessary for the defense of the canal or the maintenance of the neutrality thereof and shall prior to December 31, 1999, so certify to the Government of Panama.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. Church) says that the meaning of this amendment is implicit in the leadership amendment. If that be true, why not spell it out? Why not spell it out if his amendment means the same thing? But the amendment overlooks the fact that by the time his amendment is put into practice all our troops will be out. We cannot maintain a military presence there, and the only recourse that we would have under the leadership amendment is to invade the country. Under this amendment I propose to introduce, we have a right to maintain our military presence in Panama after the year 2000, if the President deems it necessary for the proper defense of the canal and maintenance of its neutrality.

So it just reserves to the President, and we have seen Presidents, present and past, who have been in favor of this Panama Canal Treaty, and I think even the Panamanians could rely upon his bona fides that he would act to retain our military presence there only if it was necessary.

But we do not know what the condition of Panama is going to be. We do not know what form of government it is going to have. We do not know whether it will be under the control of Castro or Russia. It might be an enemy country by the year 2000. Yet we are obligated, honorbound, under the treaties, to pull all of our troops out of the Canal Zone, abolish the Canal Zone now, and pull all troops out before January 1, in the year 2000.

All this amendment that I plan to offer would do would be to preserve an option, a very necessary option, in the United States, acting through the President of the United States at that time.

Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent that I might offer in the Record a letter to the editor from my distinguished constituent Kenneth N. K. Able, of Huntsville, a letter to the Huntsville, Ala., News, in which he comments in a most constructive fashion on the reason for the need to defeat these treaties. I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Huntsville (Ala.) News, Jan. 27, 1978]

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Editor, Huntsville News:

Senator Sparkman's Foreign Relations Committee has before it two proposed treaties which would have the effect of dismembering our country by giving away territory and property in the Isthmus of Panama for which our government (i.e., tax-paying public) paid the French Syndicate of Ferdinand de Lesseps, the Republic of Panama, and the Government of Colombia.

Justification of this give-away, plus the granting of additional tribute to the Torrijos Syndicate of Panama, in the name of rectification of an alleged moral wrong, is a brazen test by President Carter of the credulity of a somewhat trusting American public.

There is obviously a far stronger moral case for returning the entire State of Georgia to the Cherokee Nation. Actually, if Carter's casuistic reasoning were pursued to its logical conclusion, the precedent set by these proposed Panama treaties would dispossess white and black Americans, alike, of every inch of what we have long regarded as American soil.

Other arguments to either justify or extenuate these capitulatory "treaties" seem equally preposterous. Regardless of Presidential "interpretations" and oral "understandings," could any person in full possession of his faculties actually believe that either the neutrality or the defense of the Panama Canal would be better assured by the transfer of sovereignty and ownership to a "banama republic" with an "emperor Jones" style of government?

Also, could any sane and prudent adult person really believe that we "Gringos" would thereby be more highly admired and regarded by Latin American jingoists and racists? The foregoing and other attempted justifications may be persuasive for the feeble-minded but are gross insults to the intelligence of mentally competent members of the American public.

What, then, are the real reasons for Mr. Carter's ardor in seeking to despoil our country of a legitimate and valuable asset?

And, why should our moralistic President propose to shower additional American blessings and resources upon a regime which is something less than virtuous in the recognition of "human rights," which permits political activity only by the Communist Party, which adores and consorts with the Castro-Communist regime in Cuba, which has actively engaged in the supplying of narcotics for street sale in the U.S.A., and which negotiates with the U.S.A. on the basis of threat and machete brandishing?

And, how is it that Mr. Carter has proceeded in this manner with supreme disregard of the responsibility of Congress under Article IV, Sec 3, para 2, of the Constitution he swore to defend—and with supreme contempt for the Senate, by staging a theatrical treaty-signing extravaganza to embarrass "the Hill" in its consideration of the "treaties."

Also, may it be asked, what explains the apparent functional illiteracy of the Supreme Court in connection with the above-mentioned Constitutional provision?

In light of recent revelations regarding substantial financial involvements of certain large American banks with the Torrijos regime, don't you agree that responsible handling by the Foreign Relations Committee would necessarily call for the conduct of a thorough and searching inquiry into all White House instructions to the treaty negotiators and into all circumstances underlying and surrounding the negotiation of these America-despoiling "treaties"?

If we are to have "open government" and "open covenants, openly arrived at," the Committee owes no less to the American people than to investigate all these matters thoroughly and to disclose the findings without whitewash. If impeachable offenses have been committed, the corrective procedural processes should be invoked.

Sincerely,

KENNETH N. K. ABEL.

AMENDMENT NO. 33

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk for printing and to lie on the table the amendment to which I referred in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed and, without objection, the amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if there are no questions by other Members of the Senate—

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to yield to my distinguished senior colleague, Mr. Sparkman.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I remember when we were having hearings on these treaties.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. My colleague, the Senator from Alabama, appeared and testified, and I thought he made a very fine impression.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I remember at the time that he said that he felt that the treaties could be cured—he may have not used that word—with some rather simple amendments. Is that not correct?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I stated this, and I believe the distinguished Senator will bear me out on this, that I felt that it needed to be amended in at least five major areas and that the treaty, as so amended by the Senate, could well serve as a blueprint for future negotiations. I did not have in mind it would merely be sent to Mr. Torrijos for rubberstamping by him.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No.

Mr. ALLEN. And then that would be the treaty agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is right on the procedure that would be necessary.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But, nevertheless, he indicated that he could go along with treaties of that type.

Mr. ALLEN. I could go along with it if these major amendments are adopted, to send it back for further negotiations, yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. And then if it came back in that form, after renegotiation, that I felt that it could be approved.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. And as I said, I was very much impressed with the suggestions the Senator made at that time. In fact, I think I commented on it here on the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. The Senator certainly did. I appreciate it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I commented that the Senator's testimony was helpful, that the Senator did suggest amendments, but that if those amendments could be worked out satisfactorily then the Senator felt further negotiation could be held and it might be possible to get a workable treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; that is true. But it did presuppose not ratification at this time but further renegotiation. Is that not correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. My impression was that the Senator felt that it could be successfully negotiated. I think I used the expression "could be worked out."

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; and I will say, too, that if the amendments I plan to offer are accepted then I feel that it would be approved here in the Senate, and I would start off with the amendment to which I have referred, that we maintain our military presence there in the Canal Zone if the President deems it necessary for the defense of the canal.

So I hope the distinguished Senator from Alabama, my able and distinguished colleague, will start off, then, by agreeing to my amendment and voting for it as one of the conditions precedent to our agreeing on the treaty.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, we will have to see about that as we proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. That is what I rather thought. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. President, I want to pay tribute to my distinguished senior colleague (Mr. Sparkman) for his diligent and able work on these treaties in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and for keeping an open mind on the subject, and I appreciate the fact that he has studied this matter and has tried to come to what he considered a treaty or treaties that are in the best interests of the people of the United States.

He and I have independently reached differing conclusions with respect to the treaties, but I do pay tribute to him for his hard work, his sincerity of purpose, and his full and complete consideration of the matter before us at this time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank my colleague.

Mr. ALLEN. I would like further to say that I do regret that my distinguished senior colleague, whom I respect and admire so much, and I have reached different conclusions. I would like for Alabama to speak in a loud voice, "No," with respect to these treaties.

Sometimes when the Senators from the same State differ—I see the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Hollings) here. I rather feel that possibly he might be at some point of difference with his senior colleague with respect to the treaties. Ordinarily where the Senators differ on a question, they do cancel their votes. In this case, however, Mr. President, that is not true. And even despite my distinguished colleague's seniority, his great experience, and his prestige as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the particular vote of final approval of these treaties, the vote of the junior Senator from Alabama is going to count twice as much as the vote of the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama, and the vote "No" of the junior Senator from Alabama will not only cancel out the vote of my distinguished senior colleague (Mr. Sparkman), but it will also cancel out the vote of one other proponent of the treaties.

So we find that Alabama is in fact speaking out on this subject—speaking in a weak voice, I might say, Mr. President, because of the fact that Mr. Sparkman and I do differ, but still Alabama is able to speak out, even if in a weak voice, against these treaties.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Harry F. Byrd, Jr.). Under the previous order, the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Weicker) is recognized.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Weicker) would yield to me for the purpose of a short statement. I do not propose to undertake a full rebuttal at this time, because the Senator has been waiting patiently for the floor, but there was one remark made in the course of the debate—

Mr. WEICKER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much for his courtesy.

Mr. President many statements have been made in the past hour that must have our audience on public radio thoroughly confused if not literally hanging on the ropes. All of these statements will have to be addressed and rebutted in the course of the debate, and the confusion that exists will have to be clarified. But there was one statement that is so striking that I must reply to it at this time. It was asserted that by virtue of the neutrality provision in the treaties we somehow open the canal to warships of other nations, including enemy ships.

Mr. President, this is not just a distortion of the fact, but it is one of such alarming proportions that a reply at this time is mandatory. Under the existing treaty governing the present operation of the canal, the United States is formally obligated to respect and maintain a regime of neutrality. The provisions are written into the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, and the governing article reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. * * * Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

From the moment the United States opened the Panama Canal for international traffic in 1914 the canal has been administered in strict accordance with the terms of the treaty I have just quoted. It has been a neutral waterway, open to the passage of all ships, including warships, of any nation. Nothing in the pending treaty changes this arrangement in any way detrimental to the United States, and to suggest that it does is contrary to fact.

From the beginning, the United States has protected its national interests by preventing any hostile ships from approaching the canal. Obviously, you do not want to stop one in the middle of the locks. That would be a rather self-defeating way to prevent an enemy vessel from transiting the canal. We stop them out at sea. We prevent them from reaching the canal.

That is what we have done from the beginning, and that is what we would continue to do under these treaties. Let there be no confusion on that score.

I might say, Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. CHURCH. May I have 1 additional minute?

Mr. WEICKER. One minute.

Mr. CHURCH. I might say, Mr. President, that the pending treaties actually improve the position of the United States with respect to this subject, since Panama, for the first time, undertakes an obligation to prevent any foreign troops from occupying any part of Panamanian soil. That is not true under today's arrangement. Under the existing treaties, there is no legal basis for the United States to complain if Panama invited Soviet troops and Cuban troops into Panama and stationed them right up against the fences of the Canal Zone. So, if anything, the position of the United States with respect to both the protection of the canal and the neutrality of the canal is improved under the pending treaty, not impeded. The record should be made clear on that point.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. WEICKER. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. As to the distinguished Senator's statement. There was a further agreement, as I understand it, between Panama and the United States, entered into in 1914.

This agreement allows certain vessels neutral status, which was as written into the treaties, but it also requires, as I recall, such shipping to remain in Panamanian waters for 3 months, before transiting the canal, and vice versa. I do not have the document with me at this time. It is called the Protocol of 1914, and I will introduce it into the Record later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, there is nothing in the evidence before the Foreign Relations Committee to suggest that any subsequent agreement altered, obviated or repealed the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, nor is there anything in the record to suggest or imply that the United States ever operated the canal except in accordance with the principles of neutrality as set forth in that treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. How many such enemy submarines transited the canal during World War I?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. WEICKER. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. In the First and Second World War no enemy submarines transited the canal because the U.S. Navy controlled both the Atlantic and Pacific access and prevented them from even approaching the canal. This is precisely what we would do under the new treaty.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, as the Senate begins its debate on the Panama Canal treaties, I am reminded of the words of the gentleman whose birthday we just celebrated, Abraham Lincoln.

Let us have faith that Right makes Might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it.

Really, this is the essence of the argument presented to the U.S. Senate, defining the word "might." Is it defined in terms of a bodily presence, such as has been suggested by various opponents of the treaty?

Is it defined in terms of military hardware, which has been the essence of our foreign policy during the last several decades?

How does one, in the year 1978, define the word "might?"

I do not see why anyone in this Nation should have great difficulty with the answer to the question. The greatest strength of the United States is not in the head count of its military; is not in the numbers of weapons which we possess. It is today, as it has always been, in the spirit of its people. It is the state of our spirit that determines the state of the Union.

I do not see this as a time to question the value of strength of spirit in foreign policy when it comes to our dealings with the country of Panama. But there are those who still would define might in a more traditional sense. In the sense of years gone by, failing to understand that invariably it is a combination of spirit, of arms, of policy. All these in the sum total determine the strength and weakness of any particular nation.

Our own beginnings as a nation were totally contrary to the foreign policy of those times. The United States of America, or rather the colonies, did not have the armies, did not have the weapons, but certainly had the principles and certainly had the spirit which drove them to achievements way beyond any numbers.

So now it is that not only in this hemisphere, but throughout the world, the strength of any nation is going to be measured in more than just terms of hardware, in more than just terms of armies. Rather, it will be in terms of deeds matching the words of any particular philosophy.

As we view the words of totalitarian philosophies, communism included, there is little cause for trust on the basis of the actions of such nations.

In our own hemisphere, and throughout the world; in Africa, the Middle East, the Far East, nation upon nation is waking up, unwilling merely to follow the voices of a few leaders; rather, each one setting its own course in history, demanding the same quality of life as the more fortunate of its neighbors. Therefore, a great opportunity is available to the United States of America, an opportunity unparalleled in our lifetime: not to impose as a matter of fiat or dictation our philosophy, but, rather, by example to have others reach for it and want to emulate it.

Is there anything to be emulated in the old Panama Canal Treaty, in the terms of spirit, or in the terms of principle, or in the terms of what is right? Is there anything to be emulated?

It was the great technological achievement of its time, but it accommodated the big-stick ideas and philosophies of that time. That is no longer going to work.

I have no fear of our image when the United States is going to be out of Panama bodily. Rather, I anticipate that day when, yes, we are out bodily, but the spirit of this Nation is what remains behind as our strength. That is what is important.

During the past several months since it has become the issue, I have heard every conceivable type of criticism of the treaties except criticism based upon logic and fact.

I do not know what this exercise is that we are all going to go through tomorrow, but I do not think it stands to any great credit of the United States of America to have the Senate of the United States engage in such an exercise.

Is there anyone in this Government, in any branch, who could withstand the type of scrutiny on personal lives which will be applied here during the course of the debate on this treaty? And what does it really have to do with the treaty?

Earlier the Senator from Alabama made reference to his rather simple amendment, whereby our presence is maintained even after the year 1999.

He knows, as well as I, that that entirely destroys the value of the treaty. It is not that we are giving anything away; rather, it is that at the end of 20 years our presence, not only in Panama but in the entire Western Hemisphere, will be stronger than ever because it is an accepted not a forced presence.

Our presence will not be a matter of pieces of paper; belief in the United States of America and what it stands for will not be a matter of a piece of paper, but, rather, will be based upon the deeds of a great nation.

I intend, Mr. President, not only to vote for ratification of these treaties, but I intend to vote for them and speak for them enthusiastically. I intend to be on this floor in the weeks ahead, not merely to have a voice heard, but to respond to those who would take what could be one of our great moments in history and turn it into something shallow, something petty, something offered grudgingly.

There are many Americans who feel we should not ratify the Panama Canal treaties. They are men and women of good sense, good will, and honorable intent. I have no doubt that it would be a very easy matter, indeed, for many of us here to succumb to the polls and, in effect, become pollsters ourselves; in effect, to stand here with a finger to the wind. Well, this is just one of those times when the tough side of the job becomes apparent.

I daresay most of my colleagues would agree that being a U.S. Senator is a wonderful thing. It is a very stimulating enterprise in the sense of colleagues, in the sense of the challenges that confront us every day. It certainly is diverse. Great attention is paid to each of us in terms of the media. Whenever we go to banquets or other affairs the spotlight is on us. That is the nice part of the job.

I remember very well the years I spent serving in the U.S. Army as a second lieutenant, then a first lieutenant, then a captain. Very frankly, I preferred serving in the Army in the capacity of an officer rather than an enlisted man. As to meals, transportation, quarters, privacy, everything, it was a far better way to serve. One day, in the course of one of our firing exercises down at Fort Bragg, the chief of the firing battery came up to me and explained that in the No. 3 gun, a round had not gone off. Would I go ahead and perform my duty? I asked exactly what that was.

He said:

Well, lieutenant, you are supposed to pull the lanyard and wait 5 minutes; then it is your job to open up the breech and clear the round.

All of a sudden, the job of being an officer was not so pleasant. Here was the other side of the coin. I think the time has come in this country, in many respects, for leadership to clear the breech, to understand that that is part of our job also. It is the tough part.

We have come off an unpleasant experience in Vietnam. Nobody is going to deny that. And I am sure some are looking, in an international or diplomatic sense, to regain our manhood.

I do not think we ever lost it. I think, we came to a realization that whatever our quests in this world, logic and facts had better stand behind them if the United States is to prevail.

I feel that, if it is leadership we are looking to regain, we are not going to do it in the traditional sense of beating up on the smallest guy on the block. Rather, we are going to do it in the way of elevating our actions to the idealism and to the high principle to which we have always striven as a nation.

The opposition is based on a bedrock assertion that we should not "give away," as the phrase goes, the Panama Canal. Such arguments, it seems to me, owe far more to demagoguery than to reason. It is a sorry day for America when we can do no better than to say, "It is ours, we built it, we paid for it, and we are going to keep it." That is not an argument, that is a petulant, bullying assertion unworthy of a great power.

National pride in the Panama Canal as our moonshot of the early 20th century runs high whenever and wherever it is discussed, and understandably so. We achieved a technological and engineering marvel during the first decades of this century by drawing on financial and technical resources which were uniquely ours. Now, in the last decades of this century, we are called upon to draw on equally rare and powerful resources of fairness and goodwill to return the canal and the zone which surrounds it to Panama.
